United States; and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." I find nothing, said Mr. T., in this article of the treaty, incompatible with the proposed amendment. The rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States are guaranteed to the inhabitants of Louisiana. If one of them should choose to remove into Virginia, he could take his slaves with him; but if he removes to Indiana, or any of the States northwest of the Ohio, he cannot take his slaves with him. If the proposed amendment prevails, the inhabitants of Louisiana or the citizens of the United States can neither of them take slaves into the State of Missouri. All, therefore, may enjoy equal privileges. It is a disability, or what I call a blessing, annexed to the particular district of country, and in no manner attached to the individual. But, said Mr. T., while I have no doubt that the treaty contains no solid objection against the proposed amendment, yet if it did, it would not alter my determination on the subject. The Senate, or the treaty-making power of our Government, have neither the right nor the power to stipulate, by a treaty, the terms upon which a people shall be admitted into the Union. This House have a right to be heard on the subject. The admission of a State into the Union is a legislative act, which requires the concurrence of all the departments of legislative power. It is an important prerogative of this House, which I hope will never be surrendered. The zeal and the ardor of gentlemen, in the course of this debate, has induced them to announce to this House, that, if we persist and force the State of Missouri to accede to the proposed amendment, as the condition of her admission into the Union, she will disregard it, and, as soon as admitted, will alter her Constitution, and introduce slavery into her territory. Sir, I am not now prepared, nor is it necessary to determine what would be the consequence of such a violation of faith—of such a departure from the fundamental condition of her admission into the Union. I would not cast upon a people so foul an imputation as to believe they would be guilty of such fraudulent duplicity. The States northwest of the Ohio have all regarded the faith and the condition of their admission; and there is no reason to believe the people of Missouri will not also regard theirs. But, sir, whenever a State, admitted into the Union shall disregard and set at naught the fundamental condition of its admission, and shall, in violation of all faith, undertake to levy a tax upon the lands of the United States, or a toll upon their navigable waters, or introduce slavery, where Congress have prohibited it, then it will be in time to determine the consequence. But, sir, if the threatened consequences were known to be the certain result, yet would I insist upon the proposed amendment. The declaration of this House, the declared will of the nation, to prohibit slavery, would produce its moral effect, and stand as one of the brightest ornaments of our country. Sir, it has been urged, with great plausibility, that we should spread the slaves now in our country, and thus spread the evil, rather than confine it to its present districts. It has been said, we should thereby diminish the dangers from them, while we increase the means of their living, and augment their comforts. But, sir, you may rest assured that this reasoning is fallacious, and that, while slavery is admitted, the market will be supplied. Our coast, and its contiguity to the West Indies and the Spanish possessions, render easy the introduction of slaves into our country. Our laws are already highly penal against their introduction, and yet it is a well known fact, that about fourteen thousand slaves have been brought into our country this last year.

Sir, since we have been engaged in this debate, we have witnessed an elucidation of this argument, of bettering the condition of slaves, by spreading them over the country. A slave driver, a trafficker in human flesh, as if sent by Providence, has passed the door of your Capitol, on his way to the West, driving before him about fifteen of these wretched victims of his power. The males, who might raise the arm of vengeance, and retaliate for their wrongs, were handcuffed, and chained to each other, while the females and children were marched in their rear, under the guidance of the driver's whip! Yes, sir, such has been the scene witnessed from the windows of Congress Hall, and viewed by members who compose the legislative councils of Republican America!

Sir, in the course of the debate on this subject, we have been told that, from the long habit of the Southern and Western people, the possession of slaves has become necessary to them, and an essential requisite in their living. It has been urged, from the nature of the climate and soil of the Southern countries, that the lands cannot be occupied or cultivated without slaves. It has been said that the slaves prosper in those places, and that they are much better off there than in their own native country. We have even been told that, if we succeed, and prevent slavery across the Mississippi, we shall greatly lessen the value of property there, and shall retard, for a long series of years, the settlement of that country.

Sir, said Mr. T., if the Western country cannot be settled without slaves, gladly would I prevent its settlement till time shall be no more. If this class of arguments is to prevail, it sets all morals at defiance, and we are called to legislate on the subject, as a matter of mere personal interest. If this is to be the case, repeal all your laws prohibiting the slave trade; throw open this traffic to the commercial States of the East; and, if it better the condition of these wretched beings, invite the dark population of benighted Africa to be translated to the shores of Republican America. But, sir, I will not cast upon this or upon that gentleman an imputation so ungracious as the conclusion to which their arguments would necessarily tend. I do not believe any gentleman on this floor could here advocate the slave trade, or maintain, in the abstract, the principles of slavery. I will not outrage the decorum, nor insult the dignity of this House, by attempting to argue in this place, as an abstract proposition, the moral right of slavery. How gladly would the "legitimates of Europe chuckle" to find an American Congress in debate on such a question!

As an evil brought upon us without our own fault, before the formation of our Government, and as one of the sins of that nation from which we have revolted, we must of necessity legislate upon this subject. It is our business so to legislate, as never to encourage, but always to control this evil; and, while we strive to eradicate it, we ought to fix its limits, and render it subordinate to the safety of the white population, and the good order of civil society.

Sir, on this subject the eyes of Europe are turned upon you. You boast of the freedom of your Constitution and your laws; you have proclaimed, in the Declaration of Independence, "That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;" and yet you have slaves in your country. The enemies of your Government, and the legitimates of Europe, point to your inconsistencies, and blazon your supposed defects. If you allow slavery to pass into Territories where you have the lawful power to exclude it, you will justly take upon yourself all the charges of inconsistency; but, confine it to the original slaveholding States, where you found it at the formation of your Government, and you stand acquitted of all imputation.

Sir, this is a subject upon which I have great feeling for the honor of my country. In a former debate upon the Illinois constitution, I mentioned that our enemies had drawn a picture of our country, as holding in one hand the Declaration of Independence, and with the other brandishing a whip over our affrighted slaves. I then made it my boast that we could cast back upon England the accusation, and that she had committed the original sin of bringing slaves into our country. Sir, I have since received, through the post office, a letter, post marked in South Carolina, and signed, "A native of England," desiring that, when I again had occasion to repeat my boast against England, I would also state that she had atoned for her original sin, by establishing in her slave colonies a system of humane laws, ameliorating their condition, and providing for their safety, while America had committed the secondary sin of disregarding their condition, and had even provided laws by which it was not murder to kill a slave. Sir, I felt the severity of the reproach; I felt for my country. I have inquired on the subject, and I find such were formerly the laws in some of the slaveholding States; and that even now, in the State of South Carolina, by law, the penalty of death is provided for stealing a slave, while the murder of a slave is punished by a trivial fine. Such, sir, is the contrast and the relative value which is placed, in the opinion of a slaveholding State, between the property of the master and the life of a slave.

Sir, gentlemen have undertaken to criminate and to draw odious contrasts between different sections of our country; I shall not combat such arguments; I have made no pretence to exclusive morality on this subject, either for myself or my constituents; nor have I cast any imputations on others. On the contrary, I hold, that mankind under like circumstances are alike, the world over. The vicious and the unprincipled are confined to no district of country; and it is for this portion of the community we are bound to legislate. When honorable gentlemen inform us we overrate the cruelty and the dangers of slavery, and tell us that their slaves are happy and contented, and would even contribute to their safety, they tell us but very little; they do not tell us, that while their slaves are happy, the slaves of some depraved and cruel wretch, in their neighborhood, may not be stimulated to revenge, and thus involve the country in ruin. If we had to legislate only for such gentlemen as are now embraced within my view, a law against robbing the mail would be a disgrace upon the nation; and, as useless, I would tear it from the pages of your statute book; yet sad experience has taught us the necessity of such laws; and honor, justice, and policy, teach us the wisdom of legislating to limit the extension of slavery.

Sir, in the zeal to draw sectional contrasts, we have been told by one gentleman, that gentlemen from one district of country talk of their religion and their morality, while those of another practise it. And the superior liberality has been asserted of Southern gentlemen over those of the North, in all contributions to moral institutions, for Bible and missionary societies. Sir, I understand too well the pursuit of my purpose to be decoyed and drawn off into the discussion of a collateral subject. I have no inclination to controvert these assertions of comparative liberality. Although I have no idea they are founded in fact, yet, because it better suits the object of my present argument, I will, on this occasion, admit them to the fullest extent. And what is the result? Southern gentlemen, by their superior liberality in contributions to moral institutions, justly stand in the first rank, and hold the first place in the brightest page of the history of the country. But, turn over this page, and what do you behold? You behold them contributing to teach the doctrines of Christianity in every quarter of the globe. You behold them legislating to secure the ignorance and stupidity of their own slaves! You behold them prescribing, by law, penalties against the man that dares teach a negro to read. Such, sir, is the statute law of the State of Virginia. [Mr. BASSETT and Mr. TYLER said that there was no such law in Virginia.] No, sir, said Mr. T., I have mis-spoken myself; I ought to have said, such is the statute law of the State of Georgia. Yes, sir, while we hear of a liberality which civilizes the savages of all countries, and carries the Gospel alike to the Hottentot and the Hindoo, it has been reserved for the Republican State of Georgia, not content with the care of its overseers, to legislate to secure the oppression and the ignorance of their slaves. The man who there teaches a negro to read is liable to a criminal prosecution. The dark benighted beings of all creation profit by our liberality—save those on our own plantations. Where is the missionary who possesses sufficient hardihood to venture a residence to teach the slaves of a plantation? Here is the stain! Here is the stigma! Which fastens upon the character of our country; and which, in the appropriate language of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. CONN.) all the waters of the ocean cannot wash out; which seas of blood can only take away.

Sir, there is yet another, and an important point of view in which this subject ought to be considered. We have been told by those who advocate the extension of slavery into the Missouri, that any attempt to control this subject by legislation is a violation of that faith and mutual confidence upon which our Union was formed and our Constitution adopted. This argument might be considered plausible, if the restriction was attempted to be enforced against any of the slaveholding States, which had been a party in the adoption of the Constitution. But it can have no reference or application to a new district of country recently acquired, and never contemplated in the formation of the Government, and not embraced in the mutual concessions and declared faith upon which the Constitution was adopted. The Constitution provides that the Representatives of the several States to this House shall be according to their numbers, including three-fifths of the slaves in the respective States. This is an important benefit yielded to the slaveholding States, as one of the mutual sacrifices for the Union. On this subject, I consider the faith of the Union pledged, and I never would attempt coercive manumission in a slaveholding State.

But none of the causes which induced the sacrifice of this principle, and which now produce such an unequal representation of the free population of the country, exist as between us and the newly acquired territory across the Mississippi. That portion of country has no claims to such an unequal representation, unjust in its results upon the other States. Are the numerous slaves in extensive countries, which we may acquire by purchase, and admit as States into the Union, at once to be represented on this floor, under a clause of the Constitution, granted as a compromise and a benefit to the Southern States which had borne part in the Revolution? Such an extension of that clause in the Constitution would be unjust in its operations, unequal in its results, and a violation of its original intention. Abstract from the moral effects of slavery, its political consequences in the representation under this clause of the Constitution demonstrate the importance of the proposed amendment.

Sir, I shall bow in silence to the will of the majority, on which ever side it shall be expressed;

yet I confidently hope that majority will be found on the side of an amendment, so replete with moral consequences, so pregnant with important politic results.

After a long debate on the subject, the question was taken on agreeing to the first member of the proposed amendment, in the following words:

"That the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Which question was determined in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 76, as follows:

The question was then taken on agreeing to the second member of the said amendment, which is in the following words:

"And that all children born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free at the age of twenty-five years."

On which question the vote was, by yeas and nays—for the second part 82, against it 78, as follows:

So the whole of the amendments, as proposed by Mr. TALLMADGE, were agreed to.

Some other amendments having been made to the bill—

Mr. STORRS moved to strike out so much of the bill as says that the new State shall be admitted into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States." After the vote just taken, Mr. S. said, there was a manifest inconsistency in retaining this provision.

The motion was negatived.

Some remarks were made by Mr. DESHA, Mr. COBB, and Mr. RHEA, to show why they should now vote against the bill; and by Mr. PITKIN, on the other side.

Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. ANDERSON of Kentucky, greatly as they had been opposed to the insertion of the provision which had been so much debated, yet preferred taking the bill as it stood, to rejecting it.

The question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 56, as follows:

Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams of North Carolina—56.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth," reported their agreement to the said amendment; which was ordered to be concurred in by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Edward McCarty," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the report of the Committee of Claims, on the cases of Mary Sears and William B. Stokes.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming the claim of Alexander Macomb to a tract of land in the Territory of Michigan," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House entitled "An act to incorporate a company to build a bridge over the Eastern Branch of Potomac, between the termination of Eleventh and Twelfth streets, east, in the City of Washington," with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting the location of certain sections of lands to be granted for the seat of government in the State of Indiana," in which amendments and last mentioned bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill of the House last mentioned, were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting the location of certain sections of lands to be granted for the seat of government in the State of Indiana," was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

District Judges.

H. OF R.

The engrossed bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis de la Ronde; an act for the relief of Rees Hill; an act for the relief of Gabriel Godfroy; an act for the relief of Nathan Ford; an act for the relief of David Henley; an act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Nicholas Vreeland, deceased; an act to authorize William Prout to institute a bill in equity before the circuit court for the District of Columbia, against the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, and to direct a defence therein; an act authorizing the purchase of live oak timber for naval purposes; and an act to regulate the pay of the army when employed on fatigue duty; in which bills they ask the concurrence of the House.

COASTING TRADE.

The bill from the Senate, "supplementary to the acts concerning the coasting trade," which had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, was reported by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, without amendment. [This bill proposes to divide the seacoast and rivers therein into four districts, as heretofore stated in detail.]

Mr. SILSBEE moved an amendment to the bill, which proposed, in effect, to divide the seacoast of the United States into two districts, instead of four, as contemplated by the bill; the first district to extend from the eastern limits of the United States to the southern limits of the State of Georgia; the second district from the river Perdido to the western limits of the United States.

This motion gave rise to a discussion of the merits of the bill, as well as of the particular proposition; in which Messrs. SILSBEE, SMITH, of Maryland, ORR, LIVERMORE, and WHITMAN, took part; and the debate had proceeded for some time, when

Mr. TRIMBLE, to give further time for considering a proposition so important in its character, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion prevailed, and the bill was laid on the table.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed on the tenth day of April last, to inquire into the official conduct of William P. Van Ness, judge of the southern district of New York, of Matthias B. Tallmadge, judge of the northern district of New York, and of William Stephens, judge of the district of Georgia, made a report on the case of Judge Van Ness; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S., from the same committee, also made a report, in part, on the case of Judge Tallmadge; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The reports are as follows:

15th CON. 2d SESS.—39

That, in reference to the conduct of William P. Van Ness, Esq., judge of the southern district of New York, the committee have endeavored, by the examination of voluminous documents and of a number of witnesses, to arrive at a knowledge of the transactions to which their attention was necessarily directed by the report of the Judiciary Committee made to this House on the 5th day of March last. That report stated that $117,307 01 of the funds of the district court of the southern district of New York was unaccounted for by Theron Rudd, the late clerk thereof, and that it has been most grossly and nefariously purloined. As the resolution under which this committee was appointed emanated from the Judiciary Committee, it became the first object of inquiry to ascertain how far Judge Van Ness was implicated in the misconduct of the clerk. After a diligent examination, no evidence has been discovered to establish any participation by Judge Van Ness in the embezzlement of the funds of the court; nor does it appear that he has received any of those funds, or derived any benefit from them. That there was, however, a remissness on the part of Judge Van Ness, a want of constant vigilance of the money of the court, and of rigor in enforcing the provisions of the law and the rules of court, will, in the opinion of your committee, appear from a statement of the facts. Rules had existed in the court from the 1st day of November, 1811, requiring the clerk to keep a distinct account in the bank where the court moneys were deposited, as clerk of the court, subject to the inspection of the judge and the district attorney, and forbidding the withdrawing any such money from the bank without an order signed by the clerk and countersigned by the judge, stating the title of the cause, and the party to whom the same was to be paid. Soon after Judge Van Ness took his seat on the bench, he repealed that part of the rule requiring his signature; the reasons for which, as assigned by Judge Van Ness on a former occasion, were, that the clerk was the responsible and accountable officer, in whose custody the law placed the funds of the court; and that the check contemplated by the rule would give great and unnecessary trouble to the judge in adjusting the claims of individuals, and to the suitors who might apply to him during the vacations, at his residence, one hundred and thirty miles from New York. The committee, however, think that, in most cases, the claims of suitors must have been ascertained in the judgment of the court; and to them it appears that, although the rule may have been originally adopted on a special occasion, yet the object of security to the funds was so great as to supersede all considerations of inconvenience, and to require its continuance. The rule subjecting the clerk's account to the inspection of the judge and the district attorney was also so modified by Judge Van Ness as to confine the right to the judges only.

It had been one of the rules of the court, and was adopted by Judge Van Ness, that the clerk should exhibit to the court on the first day of each August and February term a full account of all the moneys in his hands, or standing to his credit as clerk, to be examined by the court or a judge, and to be filed in the office of the clerk of the northern district. From the certificate of the clerk of the southern district, it appears that no such account has ever been rendered. His certificate embraces a portion of time in which Judge Tallmadge presided in the southern dis-strict, and the whole time when Theron Rudd was clerk.

An old act of Congress requires the clerks of district courts to give bonds in the sum of $2,000 for the faithful discharge of their duties. Although this sum is altogether inadequate to the security of such large amounts as were paid into the district court of New York during the time Theron Rudd was clerk, yet the hazard of losing even that amount would induce some watchfulness on the part of the clerk's sureties. Theron Rudd had been clerk of the district of New York some time previous to the act dividing the State into two districts, which passed 9th April, 1814, and, pursuant to that division, on the 11th April, 1814, he was appointed clerk of the southern district. From the certificates of the clerk of that district, and of the northern district, it appears that there has not been filed, in either of their offices, any bond by Theron Rudd for the faithful discharge of his duties as clerk of the southern district. The omission is the more remarkable as Mr. Rudd had previously given several bonds as clerk, under various reappointments, after having been removed.

It appears from the statements of the honorable Mr. Daggett and the honorable Mr. Hunter, of the Senate, that so late as the last of February, 1817, Judge Van Ness appeared to be ignorant of the perilous condition of the funds of the court, at a time when apprehensions were entertained by several gentlemen of the city of New York, who had communicated them to their friends in Congress. Judge Van Ness appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on the 1st March, 1817, and stated his objections to the passage of a bill then pending before that committee, and which afterwards became a law, by which moneys in the courts of the United States were directed to be deposited within sixty days from the 3d of March, 1817, in the office of the Bank of the United States, when there should be one within the district, and requiring the signature of the judge to an order for the payment of such moneys. The objections were substantially the same as the reasons urged for the repeal of the rule before mentioned, viz: that it would be unnecessary, and would give much trouble. He assured the committee of the Senate that the money was perfectly safe; that it was in the Middle District Bank, north of the highlands, where it had been carried from apprehensions of danger during the war; that the bank was respectable, and the clerk was responsible under his bond; and that it became his duty to see to the security of the money. The law passed, making it the duty of the judges of the different courts to cause the payment of the money, as before stated, and directing that any officer refusing or neglecting to make such payment should be proceeded against by attachment for contempt. On the 30th April, 1817, a rule was entered by Judge Van Ness, directing the clerk to pay over the moneys of the court, according to the provisions of the law, within sixty days from the 3d day of March then last. On the 16th day of June, 1817, an order was entered for an attachment against Theron Rudd for not complying with the rule of the 30th April. A copy of an attachment is furnished the committee, dated the 30th day of June. It appears from a rule of the court, entered on the 23d day of June, that the clerk had then absconded. On the 8th January, 1818, Thomas Morris, the marshal of the district, returned that, by virtue of several writs of attachment, he had arrested Theron Rudd, but found him in the custody of a sheriff by virtue of an execution issued out of one of the State courts of the State of New York, and had therefore committed him to the common jail of the county where he had found him. Further proceedings on the attachment were discontinued by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who instructed the district attorney to proceed by action against the clerk. The great delay in these proceedings is apparent, and it cannot be ascribed wholly to the district attorney, as the law seems to have made it the special duty of the judge to cause the money to be deposited according to its provisions.

According to the fair import, if not to the letter of the act of April 18, 1814, it became the duty of every court of the United States to designate a bank where its money should be deposited, if there should be any incorporated bank within the judicial district. On the 3d August, 1814, Judge Van Ness made a rule that all moneys which should thereafter be paid into his court should be paid to the clerk, who should deposit the same to his credit in some bank or banks to the north of the highlands, in the State of New York, until the further order of the court. The reason given for this rule was, the apprehension of danger from invasion by the enemy. Your committee do not perceive how that reason could operate to prevent the designation of some certain bank or banks. The report of the Judiciary Committee, made at the last session, states the inability of that committee to prosecute its inquiries, from a want of knowing the particular bank where the money was deposited. It is obvious that the omission of such a designation removed a considerable check upon the improper disposition of the funds by the clerk. The committee cannot discover any satisfactory reason to account for the money being suffered to remain in that situation for two years after the peace was known in this country, or for its not being deposited in some bank in the city of New York.

The report which this committee have already made respecting the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge will exhibit the courts held by Judge Van Ness, in the northern district, during the time he received an additional allowance for his services in that district. Those services do not appear to have been so great as Congress expected. With regard to the southern district, Judge Van Ness appears to have given great attention to its business. He has held all the stated terms of that district, excepting two, which have occurred since his appointment, and he has also held many long and arduous special terms.

There have been complaints against some decisions and orders of Judge Van Ness. But the respect which this committee entertain for the Constitutional rights of a judge, and for the laws, which provide adequate remedies for any errors he may commit, forbids their questioning any judicial opinions.

One instance, however, appears, from the papers they have examined, to partake more of the ministerial than judicial character. It was the case of a cargo which was a prize to the privateer Tickler, which had been sold, and the money brought into court. The judge authorized the clerk to draw out the money, exceeding $145,000, and to pay it over to the claimants, instead of directing the payment to be made to the claimants immediately; and he ordered the duties and the two per centum belonging to the navy pension fund, exceeding $15,000, to be paid to the clerk, who was to pay it over to the collector, whenever the court determined the amount due to that officer. It is not perceived why the money was not as secure in the bank as in the hands of the clerk. It appears to have been entirely lost; and, from the papers before the committee, it cannot be discovered that the court has yet determined what amount should be paid to the collector.

Under a sense of the duty imposed upon them, the committee submit these facts and observations, although, in their opinion, they do not furnish any ground for the Constitutional interposition of the House.

Respecting the official conduct of Matthias B. Tallmadge. The committee have not been apprized of any other charge against the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge than his having omitted to hold the terms of the district court for which he was appointed, according to law. It appears that Judge Tallmadge took his seat on the bench as judge of the district of New York on the 16th day of July, 1805. From that time until May, 1810, he held all the stated and regular terms of the court, (excepting that the August term in 1809 was postponed two days,) and held thirty-five special sessions. The May and August terms, 1810, were not held; the November term was held, and he presided at a special court in December of that year. In 1811, the stated terms of February, August, and November, were adjourned without being opened; the May term was held, and special courts also were held in June, October, and November, of that year. The February and May terms of 1812 were not opened, but two special courts were held in May. On the 29th of April, 1812, the act passed authorizing the appointment of an additional judge of the district, and on the 3d of July, 1812, Judge Van Ness, who had been appointed under that act, took his seat on the bench. After that period, Judge Tallmadge held eight stated terms and special courts at New York; two of the special courts with Judge Van Ness. Special courts were held in August, September, October, and December, of that year, and also the stated November term, by Judge Van Ness, who held a special court also in January, 1813. The February and November terms of that year were adjourned, the latter by Judge Tallmadge, the former by Judge Van Ness, who held special courts in March, April, May, June, July, September, and November, and the stated terms in May and August.

On the 9th April, 1814, the district was divided, and Judge Tallmadge was assigned to the northern district. Three stated terms and one special court had been held in the northern part of the State previous to the division in September and October, 1812, by Judge Van Ness. The May, one of the September, and the October terms, in 1813, had been adjourned; a special court was held in June, and one of the September terms in that year was held by Judge Van Ness. No courts appear to have been held in that district after that period, until September, 1814, when Judge Van Ness held the stated term in that month, and also the stated terms in October, 1815, and April, 1817, and a special court in November, 1817. One of the September terms, and the October term of 1814, were adjourned, and also the September term, 1815, and the September and October terms, 1816, and the January and Utica May terms, in 1818. The May terms in 1814 and 1815, the September term, 1815, and the May and September terms, 1816, in that district, entirely failed.

On the 7th September, 1815, and the 21st October 1816, Judge Tallmadge held special courts, and the stated term in October, 1816, at Salem. He held the stated terms in July and October, 1817, a special court in May, 1818, and the stated terms in May, June, and November, 1818.

It appears satisfactorily, from the testimony of several physicians, and of the honorable Nathan Sanford, given on a former inquiry into the conduct of Judge Tallmadge, that in 1810 his health became extremely delicate, and that very great exertion of body, or any unusual agitation of mind, invariably produced severe sickness, so as to disqualify him for any official duties; and that his life was prolonged by visiting a more genial climate in the Winter season.

On entering upon the duties of his office in 1805, Judge Tallmadge encountered a mass of business which had accumulated from the ill health and the death of his predecessor, and from the want of any judge in the court for the time immediately preceding his appointment. The sickness of Judge Patterson, who should have presided in the circuit court, materially increased the labors of the district judge.

The committee are of opinion that there is nothing established in the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge to justify the Constitutional interposition of the House. They have deemed it their duty, however, to present the facts, to enable the House to form an opinion on the merits of the case.

ARKANSAS TERRITORY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide a Territorial government for the southern part (the Arkansas country) of the Missouri Territory.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause (similar to that incorporated, on the motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, in the Missouri bill) to prohibit the existence of slavery in the new Territory.

This motion gave rise to a wide and long-continued debate, covering part of the ground previously occupied on this subject, but differing in part, as the present proposition was to impose a condition on a Territorial government, instead of, as in the former case, to enjoin the adoption of the principle in the constitution of a State, and as it applied to a more southern Territory.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in rising, said he regretted being obliged to vote on this bill with so scanty information. The select committee which reported it, had laid on our table no statement of facts—no census showing the different kinds of population in the territory, nor even the aggregate of all descriptions. The situation and condition of existing settlements are as little known. It, however, is generally understood that the climate and soil are suited to the culture of wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco. The delegate from Missouri now informs me that the number of inhabitants, exclusive of Indians, may be estimated at 20,000, of which one-tenth are probably slaves. Mr. T. said he was unwilling to allow the introduction of any more slaves: it could not be necessary for agricultural purposes. All the productions before mentioned, could be brought to perfection, and raised in abundance, by freemen. Cotton, and tobacco, for exportation, had been chiefly produced by the slaveholding States. But is it not reasonable, asked Mr. T., that at least one small portion of our country, capable of growing these staples, should be left open to the enterprise and industry of the North and East. He saw no good reason why that portion of the Union which he had the honor, in part, to represent, should be excluded from participating in this valuable species of agriculture. That such would be the effect of allowing a free introduction of slaves, he had fully demonstrated to the Committee when the bill for the admission of Missouri into the Union was under consideration. Mr. T. said it must be evident from the present ratio of population, as stated by the delegate from Missouri, that the labor of the territory was now performed chiefly by freemen. He hoped this state of things might not only continue, but improve. He therefore, could not consent to render labor disgraceful—to connect it, in public sentiment, with servility, and thereby degrade the condition of laboring men.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) has asked, said Mr. T., what the people of the South have done, that they are to be proscribed, and had expressed his deep regret at the introduction of this amendment. We, sir, said Mr. T. do not proscribe them; we leave them in the full enjoyment of all their rights; we only forbid them to practise wrongs: we invite them to the territory in question, but we forbid their bringing into it a population which cannot but prove its misfortune and curse; a population which, if once introduced, will fasten like an incubus upon all its energies, and from which it can never be relieved.

I regret, said Mr. T., the pertinacity with which gentlemen maintain their opposition. To my mind the amendment is both reasonable and necessary; and, if the welfare of the territory were alone consulted, I should entertain no doubt of its adoption by an almost universal vote. But other interests are to be protected; and it is said that, as the country was purchased with our common fund, it ought to inure to the common benefit. This, said Mr. T., may be considered a truism; but, unfortunately for the argument of the gentleman who adduced it, it has no application to the case before us. If it were proposed that the proceeds of the public lands in Arkansas should be appropriated to the use of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, the objection would have weight. But, said Mr. T., nothing like it is contemplated. The money to arise from the sale of lands in that territory, as in all others, will go into the National Treasury, and be expended on national objects.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) has charged us, said Mr. T., with being under the influence of negrophobia. Sir, he mistook his mark. I thank God that the disease mentioned by that gentleman, is unknown to my constituents; and it is because I wish to exclude it from Arkansas, that I have moved this amendment. But, sir, the excitement which this motion has produced, too clearly shows that the negrophobia does unhappily prevail in another section of this country; that it haunts its subjects in their dreams, and disturbs their waking hours. You, sir, have lately seen its influence on one honorable gentleman, (Mr. COLSTON,) who considered the appearance of a black face in the gallery, pending yesterday's discussion, of sufficient importance to justify a grave address to the Committee, and an animated philippic upon the impropriety of this debate. To such gentlemen it may be "a delicate subject;" but to me I confess it is not. In my estimation, said Mr. T., the delicacy of the subject is lost, and ought to be forgotten in its immense importance. "A delicate subject!" in which is involved the security and happiness of unborn millions; a subject too delicate for discussion!—because our debate may be overheard by a negro in the gallery. Sir, it is a subject vastly important to my children, and the children of my constituents, who shall hereafter emigrate to Arkansas; and, while I have the honor of a seat on this floor, I will discuss it freely whenever public duty, in my judgment, requires it.

The honorable Speaker, said Mr. TAYLOR, has asked, if we wish to coop up our brethren of the slaveholding States, and prevent the extension of their population and wealth. Mr. Chairman, cast your eye on that map; survey the immense and fertile regions which stretch from the Sabine to Georgia; count, if you can, the millions of rich acres in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, lying uncultivated and waste. If gentlemen wish to disperse their slaves, here is an abundant opening. In all these States, new as they are, slavery has already planted its roots too deep, I fear, to be ever eradicated. With this opening I hope gentlemen will be content. Let them not carry the pestilence beyond the Mississippi, into a country where its existence, as yet, is but little known. Let them agree to the amendment, and every vestige of slavery will soon disappear from the territory in question.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has added his lamentations on the existence of slavery in this country to those of his colleagues who preceded him. He informed us, too, that the Legislature of that State had passed resolutions, now in this House, requesting the aid of Congress to mitigate its evils. He nevertheless took care to give notice that he too should vote against the exclusion of slavery from Arkansas. It is not my province, said Mr. T., to question the consistency of any honorable member of this Committee, but certainly, Mr. Chairman, I should not have anticipated such a conclusion, from the evidence before him. If Virginia has found slavery an intolerable burden; if she seek the aid of Congress to alleviate its evils, confessedly too great, and too inveterate for cure; if she deplore the policy by which it was introduced, I should not have expected to find a representative from Virginia legislating for the prosperity of Arkansas, and unwilling to exclude it from that territory.

Another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. HUGH NELSON) has charged us with fighting behind a masked battery. He considers this amendment

Arkansas Territory.

H. OF R.

as an entering wedge to prepare the way for an attack by Congress on the property of masters in their slaves, in the several States. The charge is unfounded. We know too well the Constitutional powers of this House, and the Constitutional rights of the States, to entertain an idea of such flagrant usurpation. Nay, sir, said Mr. T., we do not propose, even in this territory, over which we have full and undisputed sovereignty, to take from the master his property in a slave—so far from it, that if it be fact that the labor of slaves is there in demand, by prohibiting their further introduction into the territory, that demand will be increased, and the value of such property now there, will be greatly enhanced. The same gentleman, said Mr. T., has expressed an opinion that if our ancestors had maintained the doctrine embraced in the amendment, the Federal Constitution would never have been formed, and he has thought proper to warn us that, if it be persisted in, the confederation will be dissolved. Has it then come to this? Is the preservation of our Union made to depend on the admission of slavery into a territory not belonging to the States when the Constitution was adopted? A territory purchased by Congress, and for which Congress are bound to legislate, with a faithful regard to the public welfare. Are we to be terrified from doing our duty, by threats of disunion and dismemberment? If the day ever arrive when the Representatives of one section of the country shall legislate in this hall under the influence of threats from another, it will be high time for a dissolution of the Union. No, sir, said Mr. T., that honorable gentleman greatly mistakes the people of this country, if he supposes this Union—cemented by so strong interests, necessary to all, and especially to the slaveholding States—sanctified by so much glorious achievement—sanctified by the blood of so many heroes—endeared by victories won with the exertions and treasures of all—that this Union, the preservation of which is the first lesson of hisping infancy, and the last prayer of expiring age—that this Union can ever be destroyed or in the least impaired by promoting the cause of humanity and freedom in America.

But, sir, said Mr. T., the honorable gentleman has mentioned a fact which shows how Virginia herself felt and acted on the subject of slavery, in the Convention of 1787. It was, he informs us, a Representative from Virginia who drew the ordinance excluding slavery from the Northwest Territory. This, said Mr. T., was a noble act—worthy to immortalize the name of Grayson. But alas! His zeal for the rights of man, his love for future generations, his active philanthropy and manly eloquence no longer animate this assembly. Would to God his mantle had fallen on some one of his successors. Then that successor, and not the humble individual who now addresses you, would have introduced this amendment to the consideration of the Committee. He would have supported it by eloquence so powerful, by argument so unanswerable, by pathos so irresistible, that instead of the meagre majority for which I hope, it would be carried by the united voice of every member.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., I too sensibly feel the value of your time, to proceed in this discussion. I have touched, but with the utmost brevity, the most prominent objections which have been urged against the amendment: less I could not say in justice to myself—much more I ought to say in justice to the subject. The general considerations which I had the honor to suggest, when in committee on the Missouri bill, are equally applicable on the present occasion. I will not repeat them—they are fresh in your recollection. May the future inhabitants of Arkansas approve the decision we now shall make—I ask no more. Let their interests be our guide, and the further introduction of slavery will not contaminate their borders.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, in taking a view of this subject, let it not be forgotten, that we are legislating in a free country, and for a free people; the importance of the principle now contested, demands our utmost attention and vigilance to the great principles of the Constitution, and particularly to that friendly compromise entered into by the worthy framers of that instrument. It was then conceded that the slaveholding States were to hold an equal portion of policy, and to be entitled to the same advantages as other States in the Union. But it appears by the prohibition and restriction attempted to be made as a condition of admitting new States into the Union, a direct violation of that sacred compact is attempted. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR) which prohibits slaves from being taken into the territory of the Arkansas, completely deprives the citizens of the Southern section of the Union from any advantages arising in the Government, or from having either part or lot, or any inheritance, on the west side of the Mississippi. Sir, was it not purchased by the whole United States? Did not the Southern States contribute their full share for that purchase? And are they not morally and politically entitled to equal advantages of the soil? It is to be presumed that a great portion of the population of that territory will be emigrants from the Southern States; they will be disposed to remove to that climate suited to their constitution and habits, or the culture of rice and cotton. Shall they be proscribed, and prohibited from taking their slaves? Sir, if so, your land will be an uncultivated waste—a fruitless soil; it is further south than the 35th degree of latitude, a low and warm country, that will not support a laboring white population.

But, sir, I contend that we have no legitimate power to legislate on the property of the citizens, only to levy taxes. We might, with the same right, prohibit other species of property from crossing the Mississippi. Have not the Southern States yielded to the Eastern States so much of their favorite system of free white population, as to give up and relinquish the new States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and all the vast territory north of the river Ohio? and shall the slaveholding States be withheld from a small share of the prospective advantages arising in the settlement of this new territory? Gentlemen seem to think that they are serving the cause of humanity effectively, in prohibiting slaves to cross the Mississippi. In this they are mistaken; they are withholding from them the means of all the comfort and happiness their condition affords; that is, food and raiment. It is well known that in the frontier country the servant feeds as his master, and is sufficiently clothed; while in the interior of the old States the means of subsistence is scanty and improvident.

But, sir, the great and radical objection to the amendment proposed, is taking away from the people of this territory the natural and Constitutional right of legislating for themselves, and imposing on them a condition which they may not willingly accept. In organizing a territorial government, and forming a constitution, they and they alone, have the right, and are the proper judges of that policy best adapted to their genius and interest, and it ought to be exclusively left to them. If they wish to exclude slaves from being taken into their territory, they can prohibit them by their own act. If they think proper to admit the emigration of slaves, they can say so. Let them be their own judges, and not force upon them a yoke they may not be willing to bear. The people of the Arkansas and of the West are competent judges of their Constitutional rights, and well know how to appreciate their privileges as freemen; and be assured, the further from your metropolis, the greater the enthusiasm for liberty. Slavery is an evil we have long deplored but cannot cure; it was entailed upon us by our ancestors; it was not our original sin, and we cannot, in our present situation, release ourselves from the embarrassment; and, as it is an evil, the more diffusive, the lighter it will be felt, and the wider it is extended the more equal the proportion of inconvenience. We know, we felt yesterday on the Missouri bill, you have the power; you are the majority; but do not bear us down on this question. I trust that gentlemen will exercise on this vote a spirit of conciliation, and give the Southern States an inheritance among their brethren, by suffering such of us as are disposed to become citizens of the Arkansas to take our slave property with us. Then your lands will be sold; your soil will be cultivated; and your country will flourish.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said he regretted very much the discussion of this subject in its present form, with regard to these territories, calculated as it was to arouse feelings which had long slumbered, and which could never be resuscitated without great danger to that humane object we all had in view. He regretted it the more, because it never was without pain that he found himself compelled to assume even the appearance of opposition to the most enthusiastic notion for the abolition of slavery. With such impressions, he should not have taken any part in the discussion, if the question had not been treated by the gentleman who has just resumed his seat, (Mr. CUSHMAN) as one of liberty and slavery, an idea he utterly disclaimed; and, with a view of preventing any misconception of the course he felt it his duty to take, he would detain the Committee a short time while he explained the reasons by which he was influenced. Mr. McL. said, he would yield to no gentleman in the House, in his love of freedom, or in his abhorrence of slavery in its mildest form. His earliest education, and the habits of his life, were opposed to the holding of slaves, and the encouragement of slavery. At the same time, he would yield to no gentleman in the House in his regard for the Constitution of his country, and for the peace, safety, and preservation of the Union of these States. To these great objects all minor considerations should give way. He would unite with gentlemen in any course within the pale of the Constitution, for the gradual abolition of slavery in the United States. Beyond this, the oath he had taken as a member of the House, forbade him to go. The fixing of a line on the west of the Mississippi, north of which slavery should not be tolerated, had always been with him a favorite policy, and he hoped the day was not distant when upon principles of fair compromise it might constitutionally be effected. He was apprehensive, however, that the present premature attempt, and the feelings it had elicited, would interpose new and almost insuperable obstacles to the attainment of the end.

Mr. McL. said, that gentlemen had lost sight of the real questions under consideration. They had treated the subject as if we were now deliberating upon the expediency of increasing the slavery in the United States from abroad; or, as if we were to decide whether there should or should not be slavery among us. Sir, if this were the question, there is no gentleman on this floor from the North or South who would hesitate in his opinion. He believed there was no quarter of the country in which slavery is more seriously deplored than in the South. But, it was an evil which existed—it had been unfortunately entailed upon us, and it required the united and dispassionate wisdom of the nation to mitigate its horrors and soften its calamities. The farther increase of slavery from abroad had been prohibited by very severe laws, and we were at this session about to pass others, enforcing their provisions, and repairing their defects. The present question regarded merely the disposition of the slaves among us, and that only in a limited extent. Sir, said Mr. McL., what is the question now before the Committee?

France, by the treaty of April, 1803, ceded to the United States the territory of Louisiana—by certain limits, within which are contained the territories of Missouri and Arkansas, and upon the terms therein specified. At the time of this session there were a number of slaves in both places, belonging to the people inhabiting those territories, and from that time, until now, there has been no inhibition of the transportation of slaves to these territories from those States whose municipal regulations permitted their exportation. From these causes, the number has been increasing daily to the present time, and it is admitted that there is at present a very considerable slave population.

The restrictions which are now proposed, amount, in fact, first, to the emancipation of the present slaves and their issue; and, secondly, to a condition precedent to the admission of these Territories into the Union, as States, that they shall prohibit the introduction of slavery in future from any part of the United States. Under these provisions, persons removing thither with their families, and with the bona fide intention of residing permanently therein, are prohibited from carrying with them this species of property, should they be the owners of any.

I have no doubt that these propositions proceed from the most humane philanthropic motives, and nothing can more gladden the heart than the contemplation of a portion of territory consecrated to freedom, whose soil should never be moistened by the tear of the slave, or degraded by the step of the oppressor or the oppressed. It is a theory which we should be very apt to reduce to practice without even consulting the condition of the present miserable race of slaves in many parts of the United States, if we had the power to do so. But, although Mr. McL. desired the result as sincerely as any man, he was bound to say, that, after a deliberate investigation of the subject, he did not believe that Congress possessed the power to impose the restriction. As it regarded the unfortunate beings now held in slavery in those Territories, he said, he had no more right to provide for their liberation than he had to invade any other species of property whatsoever. Their owners had acquired the legal title to their labor and services, it had become a vested right, and we had no power to disturb it. We had no greater power to take from them their property in these slaves than we had to deprive them of any chattel or other object of ownership. He did not mean to consider the slave as a mere chattel; he viewed him as an ill-fated member of the human race, doomed by a hard and cruel fortune to devote his labor and services to another; he was the subject of the protecting arm of the law, and his life and person were sacred from those outrages which might be committed with impunity upon other articles of property. But, after all, his services and his person belonged to his owner; he was the property of his owner. The man who steals a slave is guilty of felony—this shows him to be property. But, the constitutions of the States in which slavery is tolerated, and the Constitution of the United States, recognise the interest of the owner in his slave as property. The Union of the States is founded upon this principle; and the owner is authorized to reclaim his slave on the ground of property, when he shall have absconded from his service. In many of the States they are liable to be taken in execution and sold for debt, considering them as property. This is the law in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. If we treat them, therefore, as property, and if we even consider it in a limited sense, that the owner has property in, or right to, the service merely, it is, nevertheless, a right, and we cannot interfere with that right by a mere act of legislation.

What would be said of the Legislature of the State of Delaware, or Maryland, if, by law, they were to declare all the slaves within their territory to be free? Could it be pretended for a moment that they would have any right to do so? The utmost any State has done, has been to say, that, after a certain day, sometime in prospective, the issue of all persons held to slavery shall be free. He would not now discuss this right, though he could not discern how the right to the usufruct of this property could be at all impaired, and, at any rate, in the case alluded to, the owner would be allowed the privilege of removing his slave before the day arrived when the law was to take effect. As it regarded the slaves, at present existing, therefore, we certainly had no power to interfere; and the question was of consequence narrowed down to the simple propositions to prohibit the introduction of slaves in future, and to denying to the inhabitants of those Territories about to become States the right and privilege of deciding for themselves in this particular. It by no means follows that they will not decide to exclude slavery in future; it is quite probable they will find it their interest to do so; but have we the right of taking from them the privilege of judging of their own interest and policy in this respect? To our power to do this, either as regarded the State now to be admitted, or the territory hereafter to become a State, he conscientiously believed the Constitution, and the national compact, to which he would hereafter refer more particularly, opposed an insuperable barrier.

Mr. McL. said he denied that Congress had power to impose any condition upon the admission of a State into the Union impairing its sovereignty. We had a right to require the form and spirit of its Constitution to be Republican, and we had the right to say that we would or would not admit, but we could go no further. We could impose no terms in abridgment of its rights of sovereignty whatsoever, and he protested against the opposite doctrine as leading to the most pernicious consequences. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." When so admitted they become members of the Union, as the others who have been admitted before them; it is but an addition of another link to the old chain; incurring the same obligations to contribute to the common defence and general welfare, and therefore entitled to the same rights and privileges with the other Confederates. The term "State" imports sovereignty, and the term "State," in relation to the federative system of the United States, imports the same degree of sovereignty as is enjoyed by the States of that Union. It is of the very essence of our Government, that all the States composing the Union should have equal sovereignty. It is the great principle on which the Union reposes—the germ of its duration. How long would this empire be held together, composed as it is of many parts united together for a common interest, if all those parts were unequal in their privileges, unequal in their rights, but compelled to make an equal contribution to the support of the others? It would be a motley tribe of sovereign and demi-sovereign States—a congregated mass of incoherent particles—disorder and dismemberment would be the inevitable consequence. Besides, sir, a constitution is the charter containing the principles by which men are to be governed in their persons and property—it is the charter of rights of a free people—in its formation, deliberation and freedom of deliberation are necessary ingredients; but, if we are to make their constitution, or prescribe the terms of it, what becomes of the right of deliberation? We dictate the terms ourselves to suit our views, without regard to their interests or condition. In effect, we agree to admit them to be a State if they will consent to be less than a State—to constitute them a member of the Union, if they will agree to give up the rights of judging of the form of government best adapted to their condition. But, sir, what are the limits of this power? If we have the right to impose this condition, what condition have we not a right to impose? The power must be general, or it does not exist. If we have the right to insist upon a stipulation on the part of the new State, not to admit slaves, because it is humane and politic to do so, we would have an equal right to insist upon a stipulation of another kind, if it should also appear to us to be wise and politic; we might prescribe, as a condition, that their right of suffrage should be regulated as we should direct; that their representation should not be as large, in proportion to their population, as other States; that they should not have the benefit of the equality of taxation; that they should surrender to the General Government greater powers, and retain fewer rights, than the other States of the Union had done; or that they should encourage this or that religion, or no religion at all. And, sir, at some future day, when the slaveholding interest, as it has been called, predominates in this body, it might be made a condition, upon the admission of a new State, that slavery should not only be tolerated, but that it should never afterwards be interdicted. Let gentlemen remember, too, that the predominance of this interest is by no means improbable, and that there yet remains a vast, unsettled region, which the future growth of this mighty empire is destined to people and improve. Sir, it is the undoubted right of every people, when admitted to be a State, to become free, sovereign, and independent—free to make their own constitution and laws—to be the judges of their own policy, and free to alter or amend them at pleasure. The moment they are constituted a State, they would have these rights, notwithstanding the condition imposed; and, if they were to present you with a constitution, containing this provision, it would be matter of form only; they could change it immediately afterwards, and abolish the very feature you would desire to retain. The condition, therefore, would not only be unconstitutional, but useless. We do not possess the political power to enforce it; an attempt to do so would, no doubt, prove abortive as to its object; but it might leave behind it a deep and lasting wound, ranking in the bosom of the State, and finally alienate all their respect for your authority.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., besides the general principles already adverted to, we are not at liberty, as respects this Territory, to consult our power, if we possessed it. We are bound to these people by a compact which forbids us to impose the condition, and we cannot, without a breach of faith, violate that compact. The third article of the treaty of cession provides, that, "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States—and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess."

This article applies both to Missouri and Arkansas; and, in fact, so do all the arguments already used; for, though the law now to be passed refers to Arkansas as a Territory, yet it will shortly become a State, and the principles derivable from its sovereignty would then apply with equal force. By this treaty, then, we have stipulated to protect the inhabitants of this Territory in the enjoyment of their property, of which their slaves unquestionably formed a part, until they can be incorporated in the union of the United States, that is, until their population shall amount to the number always required to authorize the admission of a State, or until Congress shall pass a law authorizing them to form a constitution. As soon as this is the case, they are to be "incorporated in the union of the United States," and admitted, "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of "citizens of the United States." What are these "rights, advantages, and immunities," "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution?" That they shall have the right of holding slaves if they please to do so; that they shall form State governments, with the same rights and immunities of all other State governments; that they shall have the same power to make their municipal laws as any other States, and the same advantages as citizens of the United States. As such, as citizens of the United States, the right to possess slaves is unquestionable. It cannot be doubted that all the States possess this right of admitting or excluding slavery within their jurisdiction, as they may think fit. Pennsylvania and New York possess this right; and, though it is their present policy to exclude slavery, no one can doubt that they would have the right to-morrow, if they thought proper to do so, to alter their policy, and permit the introduction of slavery. The right to hold slaves, and, which is more important as it respects their freedom and sovereignty, the right to decide whether they will or will not hold them, is as much an immunity and advantage, under our Constitution, as the right to be represented in Congress, or the right to a freedom of religious opinion, or the right to have the slaves accounted a part of their population, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. We have no more power to impair one than another of these rights.

Sir, we cannot attach too much importance to this treaty, and the rights secured by it. It was the condition of the transfer of the original inhabitants of this Territory, and their possessions, from their former Government to ours. They enjoyed these rights under their old Government, and in the exchange of allegiance they were assured that it should not be lost; that the United States would guaranty them these rights, and protect them in their enjoyment. Strangers as these people were to us and to our institutions, the solemn obligations of the treaty should, on this account, be sacredly observed. We are to win their affections for our Government and Constitution, which can only be done by a sacred regard for their rights and our own obligations. The inhabitants who have since emigrated to this Territory, have gone under the faith of this treaty, relying upon the known good faith of the American Government, for the strict fulfilment of its stipulations. Sir, the prosperity and union of the United States depend upon the honest performance of all the engagements on the part of the Government. The protection to all its members—of the people, of the country—in the enjoyment of their rights, of every description, is the object of the Union. When the disposition to do this effectually ceases, the great chain by which we are connected will cease to bind us. And, sir, if any one or more of the States have a deeper interest in the faithful execution of the principles of our compact, it is the small States, who should be the last to relax the most rigid enforcement of their true spirit and intention.

It does therefore appear to me, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., that we are prevented, both by the principles of our Constitution and the terms of our solemn compact, from imposing this restriction; that, without considering the expediency of the measure, it becomes a conscientious duty (though to some, and to me among others, a painful one) to resist it. And yet, sir, a view of the question of expediency would go very far to mitigate the pain which we might otherwise feel at being unable to gratify our wishes. We have now in the United States a large slave population. It is certain that it cannot be increased by importations from abroad. Their sudden emancipation is utterly impracticable. In their present situation, even a gradual one is almost hopeless. To meliorate their sufferings, and soften the rigors of their servitude, is the most that can be done in many parts of the country. But while they are confined exclusively to the Southern States, owned in large numbers by a single individual, and limited to a single farm, even this change is scarcely to be expected. If, however, they were permitted to be carried by the children of the Southern planter, when emigrating to the Western country in pursuit of the riches which that fruitful territory holds out to an industrious enterprise—and I would not permit them to be sold by traders, or become the objects of profit—they would by this means become dispersed over a wider field; their condition would necessarily be improved, (for they always thrive and do better when held in small numbers;) and the chances of emancipation would certainly be multiplied in both countries; the number would be less in the South and the West; they would be less formidable to the white population; and in the course of time gradually acquire ease and freedom. In the State from which I have the honor to come, the work of emancipation is rapidly progressing, and, I believe, principally owing to the sparseness of this description of population. Their condition is also better than those further South, from the same cause. There is, however, one view of this part of the subject so nearly allied to the right of Congress to impose the contemplated restriction, that I cannot avoid advert- ing to it. It is said by the gentlemen from the South that this Territory was purchased with the common fund of the nation, to whose benefits all have an equal right; and that, by preventing the Southern planter from carrying his slaves with him when he goes to settle in this Territory, you interdict the emigration from that quarter altogether. Although it is clear that any one State might frame its municipal regulations so as to exclude the introduction of slaves, even by persons removing into it, yet it can scarcely be doubted that the exercise of this right ought to be left to the sound discretion of each State; and we know the policy of different States varies in this particular. In Delaware, persons removing from or into the State are permitted to carry their slaves with them: their introduction and exportation is prohibited only for the purposes of sale. In Pennsylvania it is otherwise. Congress would certainly have no power to interdict the emigration from one State to another; and it is worthy of consideration how far they can do the same by indirect means. I cannot admit the construction of the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) of the clause of the Constitution which provides that the emigration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited prior to the year 1808. This clause was designed to embrace all classes of people—freemen as well as slaves—coming from abroad. It could not mean to authorize Congress to prohibit the migration from one State to another, because it would conflict with another provision, that citizens of one State shall be entitled to all the privileges of free citizens in another, which secures the right of emigration; and because, if it were designed to vest the power in Congress, it would of necessity, to be available at all, be an exclusive power; but we all see the States constantly exercising it, and they have been in the habit of exercising it ever since the adoption of the Constitution.

On the whole, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., it seems to me that we have no right to impose this restriction; and that, if we had, it would be useless, impracticable, and unavailing. At the same time, I do not mean to abandon the policy to which I alluded in the commencement of my remarks. I think it but fair that both sections of the Union should be accommodated on this subject, with regard to which so much feeling has been manifested. The same great motives of policy which reconciled and harmonized the jarring and discordant elements of our system, originally, and which enabled the framers of our happy Constitution to compromise the different interests, which then prevailed upon this and other subjects, if properly cherished by us, will enable us to achieve similar objects. If we meet upon principles of reciprocity, we cannot fail to do justice to all. It has already been avowed by gentlemen on this floor, from the South and the West, that they will agree upon a line which shall divide the slaveholding from the non-slaveholding States. It is this proposition I am anxious to effect; but I wish to effect it by some compact which shall be binding upon all parties, and all subsequent Legislatures; which cannot be changed, and will not fluctuate with the diversity of feeling and of sentiment to which this Empire in its march must be destined. There is a vast and immense tract of country west of the Mississippi yet to be settled, and intimately connected with the northern section of the Union, upon which this compromise can be effected. Believing as I do that the Constitution and the compact before mentioned will not permit us to extend our policy over the whole, I will be very willing to take as great a part as I can obtain; and in so doing—though I may lament that the humane policy of those who are so anxious to effect this end cannot be more widely diffused—I shall at least enjoy the consciousness of having conformed to the Constitution of the country, and executed the national compacts in good faith.

The motion was advocated by Messrs. TALLMADGE, RIVERMORE, SPENCER, and CUSHMAN; and was opposed by Messrs. CLAY, ROBERTSON, TYLER, HUGH NELSON, STORRS, JOHNSON, of Virginia, BARBOUR, of Virginia, and KINSEY. Several of the gentlemen spoke more than once, and the debate was maintained, with much animation, until near 4 o'clock.

The question was finally taken on the first part of the motion (it having been divided) in the following words:

"That the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, of which the party shall have been convicted."

And it was decided in the negative: For the motion 68; against it 80.

The remaining part of the proposition, to declare all the children free after twenty-five years of age, who shall be hereafter born in the Territory, was negatived without a division.

The Committee then proceeded with the bill, and having gone through it, next took up the

ALABAMA BILL,

For enabling the people of that Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the same into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Much time was busily employed by the Committee in receiving and disposing of various amendments proposed to the details of this bill, and in considering and deciding on its provisions. Messrs. CROWELL, POINDEXTER, COBB, and others entered into the discussion. The Committee negatived one or two motions to rise, and persevered through the bill; when the Committee rose, and reported both bills to the House, with the amendments made thereto; and at near five o'clock the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 18.

A new member, to wit: ROBERT RAYMOND REED, from Georgia, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John Forsyth, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill, supplementary to "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Timberlake," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, moved the House to take into consideration the resolution submitted by him on the 23d ultimo, for the erection of a monument to the memory of the late Major General the Baron de Kalb; which motion was negatived.

Mr. HOLMES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the first meeting of the next Congress, at an earlier period than the first Monday of December, and that the committee have leave to report by bill.

The resolution was read, and the question being taken to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the Committee of Claims were directed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the act for the relief of Major Loring Austin and George R. Wells, as that the Secretary of War shall settle the claim of the said Austin, for eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and ninety-five cents, instead of the sum of six hundred and seven dollars and twenty-six cents, for his expenses incurred in the defence of the suits therein named; and that the amount to be settled as the like claim for expenses by said Wells, be reduced from the sum of six hundred and eighty-seven dollars and four cents to the sum of one hundred and seventy-seven dollars and thirty cents.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the army when employed on fatigue duty," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Rees Hill; An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis de la Ronde; An act for the relief of Gabriel Godfroy; An act for the relief of Nathan Ford; An act for the relief of David Henly; An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Nicholas Vreeland, deceased; An act authorizing the purchase of live oak timber for naval purposes; and, An act to authorize William Prout to institute a bill in equity, before the circuit court for the District of Columbia, against the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, and to direct a defence therein; were severally read the first and second time, and referred, the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth, to the Committee of Claims; the sixth, to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims; the seventh, to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the eighth, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming the claim of Alexander Macomb, to a tract of land in the Territory of Michigan," was read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS TERRITORY.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the bill to establish a separate Territorial government in the southern part of the present Missouri Territory.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the same by inserting the following proviso in the bill:

"That the further introduction of slavery, or involuntary servitude, be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been fully convicted."

"And that all children born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free at the age of twenty-five years."

The question on this motion being divided, was first taken on agreeing to the first clause thereof, in the following words:

"That the further introduction of slavery, or involuntary servitude, be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been fully convicted."

And decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Folger, Fuller, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Lawyer, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Marchand, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Robert Moore, Samuel Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogle, Orr, Palmer, Patterson, Pawling, Rice, Rich, Richards, Rogers, Ruggles, Sampson, Savage, Scudder, Seybert, Sherwood, Southard, Spencer, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteside, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Blount, Bryan, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Desha, Earl, Edwards, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hogg, Holmes, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Illinois, McCoy, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, H. Smyth, J. S. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, and Williams of North Carolina.

So that part of Mr. TAYLOR's motion was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the remaining clause of said proposed amendment, in the following words:

"And all children born of slaves within the said Territory, shall be free, but may be held to service until the age of twenty-five years."

And decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Elliott, Folger, Fuller, Gilbert, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Kirtland, Lawyer, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Smith, Alexander Smyth, J. S. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, and Walker of North Carolina.

So that part of Mr. TAYLOR's motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to reconsider the vote just taken. He had voted with the majority, for the purpose of obtaining for himself the privilege of moving a reconsideration, wishing for a full expression of the opinion of the House on this important question, which could not now be obtained, as many members were out of the House.

The question was taken on reconsidering the vote, and decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Blount, Bryan, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Colston, Cook, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Desha, Earle, Edwards, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hogg, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Illinois, McCoy, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Middleton, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Nesbitt, New, Newton, Ogden, Owen, Parrott, Pegram, Peter, Pindall, Pleasants, Quarles, Reed of Maryland, Reed of Georgia, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson, Sawyer, Settle, Shaw, Simkins, Slocumb, S. Smith, Alexander Smyth, J. S. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Folger, Fuller, Gilbert, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Kirtland, Lawyer, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Marchand, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Mills, Robert Moore, Samuel Moore, Morton, Moseley, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogle, Orr, Palmer, Patterson, Pawling, Rice, Rich, Richards, Rogers, Ruggles, Sampson, Savage, Schuyler, Scudder, Seybert, Sherwood, Silsbee, Southard, Spencer, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteide, Williams of Connecticut, Williams, of New York, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

The question being then stated on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. BASSETT, deeming every effort called for on the part of the minority on this subject, to sustain their Constitutional rights, which he considered to be assailed in the amendment just adopted, moved that the bill be recommitted to a select committee.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. PINDALL, COLSTON, EDWARDS, SCOTT, LOWNDES, and MILLS, as to the course now most expedient to give the bill; in the course of which,

Mr. LOWNDES moved that the bill be laid on the table, stating at the same time that, to prevent its being called up, and decided by surprise, he should, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, move for a call of the House, and take up the bill for a decision. This motion prevailed, and

The bill was laid on the table.
The House next took up the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill from the Senate, to authorize a State government in the Territory of Alabama, and for its admission into the Union.

The amendments were concurred in by the House, and, after an ineffectual attempt by Mr. CROWELL further to amend one of the sections, were ordered to be engrossed, and, with the bill, read a third time.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. H. NELSON in the chair,) on the state of the Union, to whom had been referred the report of the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the bank, the conditional restrictions subsequently submitted by Mr. SPENCER, the resolution absolutely to repeal the charter, submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, and that offered by Mr. TRIMBLE, to issue a scire facias.

The particular subject first in order was the bill reported by the bank committee to enforce the provisions of the act incorporating the bank, and it was accordingly announced by the Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, observed that, as there were two other propositions before the Committee, the adoption of either of which would supersede the necessity of acting on the bill, he thought it would be the preferable course first to take up for consideration one of those propositions; and he moved that the Committee proceed to consider the resolution moved on the 9th instant by himself, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed April 10, 1816.'

The Committee agreed to take up this resolution, which was read.

Mr. SPENCER rose, and stated that he owed it to the civility of Mr. JOHNSON, that, in violating the usual custom on such occasions, which allowed the mover of a proposition to commence its discussion, he was sanctioned by the assent of Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. S. begged leave to remind the Committee that there were three distinct propositions before it: the first was the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JOHNSON,) the second was that he had the honor of submitting some days since, directing the issuing a scire facias, if the bank did not, on a certain day, express its assent to a modification of its charter; and the third was the resolution of his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) directing a scire facias absolutely and unconditionally. Mr. S. observed that he should prefer a modification of the charter, even if it should, by some, be esteemed a new compact, to the total destruction of the bank, with the views and apprehensions he entertained at present of the consequences of such a measure. If the Committee should reach the resolution he had submitted, it was his intention to modify it, in some respects, particularly to omit the third proposition, which proposed giving the President the power of removing any director, and he should in other respects amend his propositions, as time and reflection had enabled him, he thought, to improve them. And, if the Committee should reach the bill reported by the select committee, Mr. S. observed, he should, with the approbation of the gentlemen composing that committee, submit an amendment which would require the stockholders, constituting an attorney to vote for them, to swear to their ownership of the stock. Mr. S. thought it proper to apprise the Committee of these intentions, that the subject might be fairly considered. For the reason before stated, Mr. S. said, he should at present vote against the resolution for the repeal of the charter, and against that directing the issuing of a scire facias; but, if he should not succeed in at least the plan of the propositions he had submitted, although he should not be tenacious of each particular one, he should feel it his duty to vote for a scire facias unconditionally.

Mr. S. proceeded to make explanations of some expressions in the report. The remark, that "the principal business of the bank certainly has been to discount on notes secured by a pledge of stock," was liable to misconception. The expression used does not convey the meaning of the committee; it was either an inadvertence in the draught, or an error in copying; he believed the expression originally was, "a principal part of the business," &c., and it was intended to confine the remark to the business of the bank at Philadelphia, which was sometimes loosely designated as the bank. With respect to the bank and all its offices, it would appear that about one-fourth had uniformly been discounted on pledged stock; while at Philadelphia the discounts on stock had frequently very nearly equalled those on personal security. With regard to the expression, in the close of the report, that, "whatever differences of opinion can exist among them (the committee) as to the result and inferences to be drawn from the facts stated, they unanimously concur in giving to the preceding statements of facts, and abstracts of documents their sanction," Mr. S. observed that he thought the expression sufficiently precise, but he understood it was liable to a misconception. When inferences were mingled with facts, the unanimous sanction did not extend to these inferences; but that, in all cases wherever a fact was definitely stated, the committee meant to sanction it. Mr. S. remarked, that the report had been prepared at a time of severe indisposition, and when the committee had been fatigued and almost exhausted with labor, and he should not be surprised if many erroneous expressions were found in it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, rose in support of his motion. The circumstances, said he, by which we are now surrounded, are different, very different, indeed, from those by which we were cheered at the commencement of the present session of Congress. All then was peace, tranquillity, harmony, and prosperity. The President of the United States gave to this House, and to the nation, a picture of our national felicity, truly interesting and flattering. The people of the United States were represented as more prosperous and happy than at any former period of their existence; as infinitely more prosperous and happy, than any other people on the face of the globe. What, now, is our condition? Surrounded by one universal gloom. We are met by the tears of the widow and the orphan. Pictures of highly wrought suffering, of misery, and of distress, are crowded upon us. Our sympathies are assailed. We are pointed to the Bank of the United States, and gravely told, that destroy but this corporation, and you dissolve the charm which secures to the people of this nation prosperity and happiness. And is it possible, said Mr. J., that the ten millions of people in this country depend for their prosperity, their happiness, and their repose, on the conduct of the directors of this bank? This corporation, which by its very first act put our authority at defiance, by the first step which it took, violated the charter which created it. Sir, I should consider this country in the most deplorable, the most melancholy condition, if the proposition be true, that by the act to incorporate the subscribers to this bank, which gives them exclusive privileges for twenty years, we enable them to direct the destinies of this nation, and make it happy or miserable as they shall choose. And what, he asked, had been the course of conduct pursued by a majority of the directors? Had they pursued that course which the public interests pointed out, or had they been engaged in practising fraud and corruption; in the prostration of all those principles which he considered as most interesting and most valuable to this country? I will not presume, said Mr. J., that any member of this House has taken less pains than I have done, in the examination of the facts disclosed by the report of the select committee appointed to investigate the conduct of the directors of the Bank of the United States. Has any gentleman, he continued, read the affidavits of Dennis A. Smith and James W. McCulloh, who entertains a doubt as to the facts established by their testimony? What does their evidence establish? Not that the public interest, or that the public good has been the object of a majority of the directors of this institution, but that the interest of a few large favored stockholders has been the constant and steady object of their pursuit. What were the means used to obtain the complete control of this bank? The charter was violated; shares were split up and taken in the names of individuals not interested in them, to enable the persons really owning them to give as proxies a much larger number of votes than, according to the fundamental rules of the charter, they were authorized to give, on the choice of directors, in order to obtain an undue preponderance at the board. This was known to the judges of the election. What was the next course adopted to secure completely the interest of this favored class? I know not, said Mr. J., how to speak of it, or of individuals who are not present to respond to me. In what terms shall I describe the conduct of the president of the bank? There was a transfer to him of $15,000, not in stock; both witnesses concur in stating that the stock was not transferred to him; that he paid nothing for it; that it was a transfer of money, of profit made on stock purchased and held by a few interested individuals, large stockholders, who sold 1,000 shares of the stock held by them for a profit of $15,000, and paid to Mr. Jones, in money, the amount of this speculation. Shall we call this a douceur, a present, or shall we give it a harsher name? These moneyed speculators, said Mr. J., who have an eagle eye to their interest, and pursue it with an appetite as keen as death, are not in the habit of making presents to this amount without some adequate and interested view. Having pursued the course necessary to secure to them a convenient weight and influence in the direction, it became necessary to approach the president, to touch his pulse, to soften his heart, and fix him securely in their interest. In what light shall these honorable stockholders be viewed? Shall I be permitted to apply to them the doctrine held on a late interesting and important subject—that the instigator to bad actions is worse than the actor; that he who places in the hands of the assassin the dagger, to be plunged into the bosom of innocence, is worse than the murderer? And what has been the consequence of all this art, this management? A few individuals have been enriched at the expense of the innocent and the honest. This shaving institution—has it really, said Mr. J., any claim on the justice or the liberality of this House, or of this nation? No; justice hides her face; she wishes not to look at the black catalogue of iniquities which this institution presents; humanity would gladly drop the tear of oblivion on the sickening scene. Mr. J. said he could not speak of this subject in the way it deserved, but would proceed as well as he was able.

Has this corporation, said Mr. J., by all the acts of which it has been guilty, by the division of votes, by the evasion of the second specie instalment, by the judges of the first and second elections allowing many persons to give more than thirty votes each, under the pretence of their being attorneys for others, in whose names shares then stood—when those judges, the directors, and officers of the bank perfectly well knew that the shares really belonged to the persons offering to vote upon them as attorneys—forfeited its charter? If the charter was forfeited, what, he asked, was the remedy which it was proper to apply? What the course proper for this House to pursue? Here a difficulty presented itself. The Congress of the United States, as he contended, without authority, and contrary to the Constitution, had created this corporation, which could not be tested by the application of the principle of any known system of laws in the world. Shall we, said Mr. J., refer this charter to the standard of the civil or the common law? The Roman law is represented to be the source of incorporation—according to which law, a voluntary association of individuals, at any time, or for any purpose, was capable of producing it. In England, whence our notions of it are immediately borrowed, it seems part of the Executive authority. The King, by his letters patent, creates corporations. Shall we, then, decide this question by the Roman or by the common law? I ask, said Mr. J., if either of these codes be in force in the United States? If he were not deceived by his memory, the Supreme Court had solemnly decided that the common law of England was not in force in the United States. He understood the Supreme Court as having settled that question; but, if not settled, Mr. J. said he should still contend, and felt himself prepared to prove, that the common law of England was not the law of the United States. The first settlers of this country, Mr. J. said, fled from the civil and religious persecutions of England, of Europe; they sought here that independence and happiness which had been denied them in the countries which gave them birth. In this new world, on this expanded continent, they found themselves as free from the shackles and despotic systems of Europe, as the winds and the waves which wafted them hither. They were capable of adopting any system of laws which they thought proper to select. With regret, he had heard it said in this House, that our ancestors brought with them the principles of the common law; that it was their birthright and inheritance—a sort of heirloom. This he denied, and contended that they came here free from all municipal laws but such as they chose to adopt. True, many principles of the common law were adopted by the first settlers, from choice, because they were best known to them. This was natural. But what was the course adopted after the Revolution, which surely dissolved all the charms of this boasted system of British jurisprudence, and left the people of the United States, as a nation, free to choose such system of law as they pleased? Look at all the legislation of the States after the Revolution, and after their respective constitutions went into operation; they adopted for their own municipal regulations such portions of the common law as were applicable to their situation, not contrary to their bills of rights and constitutions, and not local to the kingdom of Great Britain. Many years after the State governments had been in successful operation, when the principles of liberty and free government were well known and clearly and distinctly understood by the people of this country, the present Constitution of the United States was adopted. The people of the United States, by this instrument, which is an original, social, written compact, freely and voluntarily entered into by the contracting parties, in which all the powers of the Government are expressly enumerated and clearly defined, which had for its object the union and harmony of the States, their security against domestic disquiet and foreign aggression and danger, to regulate the intercourse of the States with each other, and with foreign nations, adopted for national and general objects, and not with a view to local and municipal regulations. Have the United States or the legislative power of the United States, Mr. J. asked, by any act, declared the principles of the common law to be in force in the United States? They are certainly not recognised by the Constitution of the United States. The principles of that law, he said, were not suited to such a Government as ours. They were generally of a character strictly municipal; they had never been adopted by legislative enactment; they had never been adopted by the only branch of the Government capable of giving law to the people of this country, as a nation—the Congress of the United States. We therefore, said Mr. J., have neither the common law nor the civil law, by which to test this charter.

But, sir, said Mr. J., we have the charter before us. Let us apply the fundamental rules of the charter, under the guidance of reason and common sense, to the conduct of this corporation. Those rules which, at its creation, were imposed on it, to govern and direct its course, without a due observance and obedience to which rules it must cease to exist. This charter has been violated; and the question now occurs, has Congress the power, the moral power, to repeal the charter, or must the question be submitted to the judiciary? Is the provision in the act of incorporation which provides the remedy by scire facias for breaches of the charter obligatory on the Congress of the United States? Cannot the power which created this corporation dissolve it? Can the faith of this nation be pledged by an act which is contrary to the Constitution of the country? Can this corporation surrender its charter? To whom would the surrender be made? Would it be to a member of the judiciary, or to a court, in session? If so, to which member, or to which of the Federal courts? Or would the surrender be made to the Congress of the United States? He humbly conceived that the corporation had the right to surrender its charter; that the surrender, if made, must be to the power by which it was created. He presumed that it would be conceded to him, that the individual members composing the corporation had the power and the right to dissolve it. Put the case, that they failed or refused to elect directors, by what process could they be coerced or compelled to perform this duty? Some member had suggested that a mandamus might be awarded. What, resort to a mandamus against an individual? Who would sue out the process? Such a process was sometimes resorted to by a superior court to compel an inferior court to discharge its duty. But it was the first time that he had heard of suing out a mandamus against an individual. If the members of this corporation neglected or refused to appoint directors, it would, as a necessary consequence, be dissolved. Mr. J. asked if this institution—if its members—had power over its duration and legal existence which Congress had not? Had they created a power greater than the creator? Had not the power which spoke this charter into existence also the power to destroy it? Mr. J. denied that a precedent Legislature could, by any act, bind its successors; contended that it was at all times competent for a legislative body to repeal the acts of its predecessors. That this Congress, that this House, would always be actuated by the strictest regard to propriety—to the immutable principles of justice—was fair, was proper to presume. But that it ought never to be restrained from repealing any of its own acts, or those of its predecessors, when the welfare and happiness of the people required such repeal; or from dissolving any corporation, or supposed corporation, which claimed to exist by some law of the United States, when that very law had been grossly and palpably violated. He considered the right clear and indisputable. Is it expedient, under existing circumstances, to exercise this right? He considered the policy equally clear and indisputable. He understood the bank was now able to pay all its debts, and to meet all its engagements. The claims of innocent stockholders can now be secured; they can now be protected from injury, if the corporation be immediately dissolved. Permit it to go on, judging from its past conduct, no man can tell what will be the result. If, in the three first years of its existence, it be convicted of such misuse and abuse of its powers; if, during that period, the whole tenor of its conduct be marked with acts of the most glaring impropriety; and if it be permitted to escape with impunity, who can estimate the consequences? Will it not hereafter put the power of this House at defiance? What reliance could be placed on the directors of the Government? From the report of the committee of investigation, it would be found that they, or a portion of them, had been guilty of as many violations of their duty as the private directors, and characterized by the same culpable regard for their individual interests, at the expense of the institution, and of the small and innocent stockholders. A due regard for the interests of the small and innocent stockholders would induce him to give his vote for the repeal of the charter. Let the corporation continue, and the interests of this class will still be sacrificed to the interests and views of the large and influential stockholders. He would, then, secure the innocent by dissolving the charter; and they would, moreover, Mr. J. contended, have another security; for he held it a clear principle, that the president and directors were responsible, in their private fortunes, for all their iniquitous and fraudulent acts, to those who had sustained injury; that the injured party had a clear remedy. These directors had undertaken to negotiate for specie in Europe. The necessity to resort to this mode of procuring the specie part of the capital, was the result of mismanagement—of abuse of their powers—of a violation of their charter—of an inordinate thirst for wealth—of an ill-judged desire to put their machine into motion. By evading the payment on the part of the favored stockholders of the second specie instalment, this negotiation was rendered necessary. How was this business conducted? On principles of equity and justice? No, sir. An agent was sent to Europe to purchase specie; the contract was negotiated, and the specie delivered in this country, at an expense to the bank of $525,297 38; an expense which resulted from mismanagement, and a fraudulent and culpable system of favoritism, extended to the large stockholders. Mr. J. said, as the large stockholders received indulgences and benefits, which made the expenditure of this sum necessary; it ought to have fallen exclusively on them, and not equally on the innocent stockholders, and the Government, which appears to have been the fact. And this act rendered necessary by a total disregard of the fundamental articles of the charter, and for the purposes of individual speculation, was one for which the directors claimed credit from the nation. Those humane gentlemen, said Mr. J., who have such claims on our justice; those artful gentlemen who can divide thirty shares so ingeniously as to enable them to give almost as many thousand votes; who can now weep for the widow and the orphan, who will be ruined by the dissolution of this charter; who had hearts as hard as stone when in pursuit of their favorite object, their idol, and their god—money; who, to obtain that desired and loved object, wealth, and its concomitants, power and influence, would have feasted on the blood, and battered on the bones of those for whom they now affect so much sympathy and sorrow; those disinterested, compassionate, highminded, honorable gentlemen, who could soften their president by a douceur of $15,000; those gentlemen, who, we are told, have strong claims on the forbearance of this House. Mr. J. regretted that this picture, this horrid picture, would be seen not only in this country, but would necessarily be presented, in all its deformity, to the gaze of the world. It would attract the eyes of all nations to the United States. That country which heretofore had claimed, and received, so much credit for the purity of its character; that country which we have been told is still so prosperous and so happy, in the forty-third year of its age, to have produced a monster of fraud and corruption without parallel. Even England, bad as he believed her, could not furnish an institution more distinguished for adroitness in swindling and fraud than this corporation. Sir, all Europe will point the steady finger of scorn at this grand shaving shop.

Mr. J. called the attention of the Committee to the struggle which was made to recharter the old Bank of the United States, and the arguments which were used on that occasion. He adverted to the feelings which were imparted to the General Assembly of Virginia, when a letter was received from Mr. Giles, a Senator from that State, on the subject of his instructions to vote against the renewal of the charter of the bank. Mr. J. said he opposed the reading of that letter; but curiosity prevailed—it was read. It seemed to him, Mr. J. said, that all acts were referred to the standard of motive. All actions appeared to be traced to some motive of interest or design. Instead of looking to the one single and grand motive which ought to be presumed to animate all in this House, the ardent and pure desire to promote the public interest and happiness, there appeared to be an effort to attribute motives much less noble, honorable, and disinterested. He could not but believe that those who sought with so much solicitude to establish impure motives, were beguiled and led astray, by glancing at the mirror which reflected the motives of their own bosoms.

Mr. J. said, he disliked to speak of himself: he would, however, to avoid the imputation of any interested or undue influence, take this occasion to remark, that he had, on all occasions, voted against the incorporation of banks; that he voted against the charter of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia—the extension of the charter of the Old Bank of Virginia; that he was not a stockholder, nor ever had been a stockholder, in any; that he had never applied for, nor received, any species of accommodation from any bank whatever.

During the late war, at a period when the Treasury was empty; when the energy of the nation appeared to be paralyzed; when ruin seemed to stare us in the face, we were told, he said, that we must have a National Bank; that without it the war could not be prosecuted—the soldiers could not be fed, or clothed, or paid, to fight the battles of the country. Great efforts were made; a bank charter was successfully carried through both Houses of Congress, and presented to the President of the United States, for his signature. Surrounded, as he was, by all the gloomy circumstances of the day, Mr. Madison returned the charter, on the express ground that it did not provide sufficiently for the interest of the Government. The Constitutional difficulties were removed from his mind; the subject had been adjudicated, and put to rest. What was the consequence? Some Republican gentlemen, Mr. J. said, now within the sound of his voice, must recollect the course pursued. A meeting was had by the Republican members of Congress, in order to agree upon principles, to determine upon a charter which would be acceptable to the then President of the United States. Before this compromise of opinion could take place; before a new and unexceptionable charter could be manufactured, the messenger of peace came, with healing in his wings. Nothing more was done at that session of Congress, on the subject. The nation's joy was testified, at the seat of Government, by illuminations and bonfires. The solemn farce performed, of illuminating the monuments of our disgrace, the evidences of the vandalism and barbarism of our enemy. Every window in the city was gaily illuminated, and the ruin and desolation of the Capitol and other public buildings and edifices rendered more strikingly conspicuous by this extravagant evidence of joy at the return of a peace which the prowess of the nation had achieved.

But, Mr. Madison's objections produced at the succeeding Congress another experiment, which proved more fortunate, not for the nation, but for the interests of speculators. The charter to the existing bank was obtained. Nothing, Mr. J. said, did he more sincerely regret than that Mr. Madison should have put his signature to such an act. That honest, that respectable, enlightened, and patriotic statesman, who had so long and so faithfully served his country, had, in this single instance, cast a shade on the hitherto bright and unclouded orbit, in which he had moved. Mr. J. said, it was extremely painful to him to refer to any act of that distinguished statesman, who had retired to private life, in any other terms than those of respect and approbation. Nor would he on this occasion have done so, except from a sense of duty; and with a view to the history of the banks of the United States, which he felt himself bound to give.

When the question first arose in this country, continued Mr. J., as to the powers of Congress to incorporate a National Bank, the wisest men in the nation differed in opinion on the Constitutional powers of the Government to create such corporation. General Washington himself, as appeared from the history of that day, labored under great difficulty—he called for the opinions of his secretaries, and doubted, and doubted, until the time had almost elapsed, which would have made the act of incorporation a law, without his signature. The difficulties and doubts which at that time surrounded the mind of the Chief Magistrate, produced a most elaborate and able investigation into the Constitutional powers of Congress to create corporations. We have not only the opinions, but the testimony of two of the most enlightened men of any age or country, Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, on the Constitutional question, whether Congress has the power to incorporate a National Bank? Mr. Jefferson's opinion and testimony will be found in the written opinion given by him to General Washington on the question. In the year 1791, Mr. Madison, in a very eloquent speech delivered in Congress, stated the following important fact, speaking of the power to incorporate a bank. "This power was proposed to be vested in Congress, in the original plan reported by the committee of the convention, among the enumeration of powers which now form the 8th section of the 1st article, but that, after three days ardent debate, on the special subject, in that body, the power was rejected and stricken out, upon the principle that it was a power improper to be vested in the General Government." Mr. J. said, that he was aware that an instrument of writing might convey more or less power than was intended by the contracting parties—that this result might be produced from the want of sufficient accuracy and precision in the terms used.

Such a charge, he presumed, could scarcely exist in reference to the Constitution of the United States. He denied that by a fair and clear deduction; that by any rational construction, this power could be derived from the Constitution. It did not belong to any of the enumerated powers. Nor was it fairly referable to any of the implied or resulting powers of the Government. He did not mean to enter on the discussion of the Constitutional powers of the Congress of the United States to create corporations, or to charter a National Bank. But, he demanded of those who held the affirmative proposition to establish, by clear and indisputable reasoning, that the bank had been constitutionally established—or, that the faith of the Government could be pledged by an act not sanctioned by the Constitution. The act of incorporation, he said, was a dead letter; it was worse—it was an act of usurpation. It was idle to talk of the faith of the Government being pledged to sustain it.

How, then, Mr. J. asked, did the question present itself? The Supreme Court, as he had before remarked, had declared the common law not to be the law of the United States; and, consequently, in making the inquiry, whether forfeiture had been incurred by this corporation of its charter, the question could not be tested or settled by the application of the principles of this system of law. According to the settled and well established principles of the common law, settled by frequent adjudications, no doubt can exist that the charter of the Bank of the United States is forfeited. In support of this doctrine, he begged leave to refer to the case of the King against the city of London, and the cases there cited. And, said Mr. J., after the disclosures which have been made, will the House permit this violated act to remain on the Statute Book a disgrace to the nation? Are we, said he, not to support the Constitution; and can the immaculate and patriotic gamblers in this bank induce us, for a single moment, to prolong an act which violates this instrument?

Mr. J. said, if this proposition to repeal the charter should be negatived, he could not vote for the bill reported by the bank committee, as he should, by so doing, recognise the legal existence of the bank. This, according to his most solemn convictions, would amount to a violation of his oath. He trusted there would be neither difficulty nor hesitation in putting down this corporation. He hoped in God his country would not present the melancholy, the degraded picture, sketched by the masterhand of Byron, when surrounded by the gloom resulting from a view of the glorious decay and splendid ruins of Rome.

"There is the moral of all human tales,

"Tis but the same rehearsal of the past;

First freedom, and then glory—when that fails, Wealth, vice, corruption—barbarism at last."

We had enjoyed the blessings of freedom. We had had a reasonable share of glory. Our arms had been triumphant on the land and on the ocean. All seemed animated, now, by the desire to accumulate wealth. He hoped the nation would still pause, and reflect, seriously reflect, on the consequences of changing the pursuit of a national character, distinguished by liberality, magnanimity, and honor, for the sordid pursuit of wealth, at the expense of vice and corruption. Mr. J. said, he had hoped much from the fair destinies of this nation, but those would be marred and destroyed, if a miserable corporation could hold the Government in check, influence its operations, plunge it into corruption, or cover it with vice and shame whenever it should please.

Mr. PINDALL, of Virginia, took the floor. He was confident, he said, that the House, as well as himself, was willing to acknowledge its gratitude to the honorable members of the select committee, who, by a laborious and deep investigation of the affairs of the National Bank, had been enabled to present to our view an elaborate statement of facts, not less interesting to the nation than important with regard to their consequences. But, whilst he remained sensible of the exalted merit of the committee, he would claim the privilege of judging for himself, by deducing his own conclusions from the facts contained in the report, and, in so doing, he would frankly acknowledge that the report sought to inculcate a principle to which he was unable to subscribe. The committee had asserted, that there might be many violations of the bank charter, which should not be considered as producing a forfeiture. Against the assumption of such principle, Mr. P. would take leave to enter his decided protest. The Legislature had enacted certain fundamental rules, to which this bank corporation was bound to conform, and, by infracting those fundamental canons, the corporation violated its charter, and thereby incurred a forfeiture of that charter. He was not prepared to say, that this House would always feel itself disposed to enforce a forfeiture for every violation of the charter, as a departure from the terms of the law might possibly be imagined, under circumstances which would induce the Legislature to commiserate the institution, or excuse the error, but he would contend, that every palpable violation of the fundamental principles of the institution would subject it to the discretion and mercy of the National Legislature (the author of its existence) which would decide on the justice and policy of enforcing the forfeiture, or excusing this offence. The select committee had supposed that some violations of the charter would induce its forfeiture, whilst other violations would not produce that effect, and, among the former, the committee had classed those violations which defeated the very objects of the institution, as expressed in the charter itself. But, it was evident, this sort of indefinite classification could afford no aid to our investigation. There was no preamble to the act of incorporation expressive of the objects of the institution. One gentleman would see, in one given violation of charter, a prostration of the objects of the institution, whilst other gentlemen, attaching less magnitude to the same crime, would look in a different avenue to find what are called the objects of the institution, and, in that predicament of vexation and perplexity, it would be seen that neither the Legislature nor the honorable select committee had been kind enough to furnish a thermometer for the true admeasurement of the objects of the incorporation. In relation, however, to one circumstance, there could arise no difficulty of opinion. Certain principles were prescribed for the control and government of the corporation, which had been dignified by the Legislature as fundamental rules and articles, and it would be equally manifest that, whensoever the corporation transcended those fundamentals, it departed from the orbit within which Congress had confined its operations.

I will now, (said Mr. P.) pray the House to accompany me, in the review of another part of the report, where will be found a feature, which cannot fail to excite in the House a degree of regret and disappointment. The report manifests that the honorable committee have deemed themselves clothed with authority to pass an unqualified censure upon the conduct of the State banks. Gentlemen are now invited to show the power of the committee to investigate the concerns or proceedings of State banks, with which it would seem the violation or non-violation of the charter of the United States Bank had no connexion. With the most profound respect for the motives and talents of the committee, I must assume the liberty of declaring that I consider this public and official condemnation of the respectable banks, which pervade the respective States, as ill-timed and unjust—as produced by the statements, and probably partial complaints of their formidable rival, who was fully heard by the committee, whilst the many respectable State institutions have incurred a heavy and cruel censure, without being summoned, or having any opportunity, to be heard in their defence. This subject, however, has been presented to us by the report, and must, therefore, demand the attention which seems due to its importance. I am sensible that the House would not, at this late day, relish a discussion of the remote and complicated causes which led the way to a suspension of specie payments by the State banks, during the late war; topics that have given birth to arguments, or rather disputes, by which public patience has been long since exhausted. Yet, there were some circumstances connected with the suspension of bank payments, with regard to which there could exist no difference of opinion. It is deemed proper to remind the House of these circumstances, the uncertainty of which will beguile us into no disputation, although their remembrance may enable us to account, in some measure, for our present embarrassment. It is certain, that, previous to the close of the late war, the disorder of the currency distressed the community, and imposed an evil not only on every quarter of the country, but afflicted almost every operation of trade. It is equally certain that the superabundant issue of bills by the moneyed corporations of the States, coeval with, and after the suspension of specie payments, produced the disorder in the state of the currency. If it be charged, that the State banks, in their over issues of paper, were prompted by an unwarrantable thirst of gain, I would not feel myself authorized to make a total denial of the charge, nor find it necessary to contend, that those banks were exempt from the prevalent appetite which has since so remarkably characterized the Bank of the United States, and which seems more or less to guide the deliberations of all corporations of trade. In truth, it may be affirmed that the spirit which instigated or enticed the commercial classes of our community to overtrade their means, insinuated itself into the coun-

ing rooms of the banks, and prompted them, also, to exertions scarcely compatible with the maxims of prudence. But, sir, can this House, as a branch of the national Government, criticise the transgressions of the banks without a melancholy pang, in reflecting that this Government has also participated in those transgressions, or at least promoted them, by the extraordinary credit which is solicited and almost demanded, from those institutions. The eighty millions of dollars, which the Government found itself under the necessity of borrowing, from the year 1812 to 1815, inclusive, were drawn from these corporations, in bank notes and bank credits. The Government, engaged in the prosecution of a just war, found it absolutely necessary to raise, for its current service, enormous sums of money, and, at the same time, saw the utter impossibility of acquiring the funds, without the aid of the State banks. It, therefore, resorted to means of temptation adapted to conquer the most stubborn prudence on the part of the banks. Not only ordinary interest and premiums of bargain were offered, but acts were passed authorizing the disbursement of bounties or bribes to brokers and agents, who would, on the part of Government, persuade the banks to advance their paper and credit. Even the wholesome restraints in the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, those prudent limitations of their discretion, previously imposed by the National Government itself, (their legitimate guardian,) were loosened, and they too were authorized, invited and enticed, to issue paper for Government loans. The ardent solicitude of Government, that the banks should stretch their credit to its utmost extension; the appointment of several of those banks, as the receivers and depositories of the public revenue; an invitation to nearly all the local banks, to open their vaults to receive the public taxes, and proceeds of the sales of public lands most contiguous to them, (which seemed to imply a confidence on the part of Government, indicating its disposition to support these banks with its powers and vast resources)—all these considerations, I say, had their due weight in influencing the liberality of the banks, who already perceived the promotion of their own interests in accepting the contracts for the heavy loans, so essential to the operations of the country.

Our Government, then, as well as the speculating merchant, contributed to produce the evil of a disordered and depreciated currency. But, in April, 1816, when the act to incorporate the United States Bank, passed, this disease in the national currency had begun to work its own cure; in proof of which, I must take leave to remind gentlemen of some of the events of that epoch. It will not be forgotten, that, at and previous to April, 1816, several of the banks had ceased to discount for new customers, and could with great difficulty be prevailed on to renew the outstanding loans then existing, whilst other banks had commenced a gradual curtailment of their loans, with a view to meet the period of a resumption of specie payments. The circumstance of the great depreciation of some bank bills, and the inconsiderable depreciation, or par value, of others, mentioned in the report of the select committee, indicated the decline of credulity with respect to the paper system, as well as a public relish of discrimination between banks of solid and spurious capitals. The State Legislatures, also, the authors and guardians of the local banks, had entered upon an exertion of their proper and visitatorial powers over these institutions, and were hastening the return of specie payments, by compelling the banks immediately, or at fixed periods, to redeem their paper in specie. At this juncture of convalescence of the paper currency, when the danger and dread of war was gone, and when our Government found it unnecessary to importune the State banks for further loans, the projectors of the United States Bank urged the National Government to call into existence a mighty corporation, to overawe and correct the local institutions, that had dealt themselves almost out of breath in supporting the Government in times of peril and adversity. It was in April, 1816, when these local banks were contemplating, and the public anticipating, the restoration of the age of hard money, and only hesitated on the deficiency of the quantity of specie in the country, that the General Government determined to cure a disordered currency by the establishment of a national bank; or, in other words, to create an artificial demand in the market for seven millions of dollars, specie, which, although done with the ostensible view of inducing the local banks to resume specie payments, would of necessity protract that event, by increasing the danger of opening their vaults to the prodigious demand for dollars to fill the coffers of the new bank. It is almost unnecessary to remark, that the policy thus adopted by the General Government produced an alarm which discouraged the payment of specie by the State banks. Indeed, some of the State Legislatures, that had been laudably engaged in the correction of their own banks, that had shut their ears against all excuses, and marked the time for the redemption of paper by gold and silver, now relaxed their rules of severity, so as to permit their home banks to escape as they could from the speculators and brokers of the new project.

Charity, and every amiable sentiment, predispose us to the impression, that this was only a mistaken policy of the General Government, whose object might have been to assist the local banks to resume specie payments, and hence reform the currency; but the dissimilar or rather opposite policy proposed by the Executive Government when the great bank was not exempt from apprehensions of being placed somewhat in the condition of the local institutions, removes the idea of friendship to them. For this, I refer gentlemen to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the United States Bank, of the 29th November, 1816, at a time when the institution feared to discount for those who were indebted to the Treasury for duties, lest it might, in consequence of the scarcity of specie, be placed in the perilous situation of other banks. The Secretary proposed to obviate the difficulty by the issue of Treasury notes, to be loaned by the bank, and to be made receivable in the payment of duties. Hence it would seem that State banks were to be cured of their inability, and compelled to pay specie, by placing the speculators, in quest of seven millions of cash, at their counters, ready to grab every dollar that found its way from their vaults; whilst the United States Bank, the great favorite of Government, must be aided, through its debility, by flooding the country with such an abundance of paper money from the Treasury, as would render the disbursement of its gold or silver unnecessary. Here it should be remarked, that although the stock-mongers, who beset this Government, continually sung of the inequalities of exchange, of the depreciation of local bank notes, and the incurable avarice of State banks, yet the bills of many of the banks retained such a credit and public confidence, as to devolve the necessity on the Executive, in seeking to frighten them into certain measures, to threaten the open opposition of the Government, with all its revenue resources, to impair, if possible, the public confidence of their stability. Let gentlemen who desire proof of this attentively read the Treasury letter, of the 29th November, 1816.

The act to incorporate the United States Bank passed on the 10th of April, 1816, and, only seventeen days thereafter, Congress adopted the resolution requiring, that, from the 20th of the ensuing February, the revenue of the United States should be paid in coin, or in United States Bank notes, (a bank which it was then not certain would ever exist,) or in the paper of such banks as redeemed their bills in specie. The avowed object of this resolution was, not only to coerce the payment of specie by the State banks, but to limit the very day and hour of that event; and this, too, at a time when the State banks and the State governments were pursuing a course to reform the currency, by the only gradual and sure means which were compatible as well with the interests of the public as the security of the banks. This resolution seems to have been wanted by the Executive, as an instrument of hostility against State banks, to be used or not, as future convenience might require, and the day of cash payments was placed subsequent to the ensuing session of Congress, that it might be modified or repealed if the capital of the United States Bank should not be subscribed, or in case any mishap should befall that institution: hence we have seen that (on the subject of the resolution) a dead silence reigned in the Treasury, until after the following midsummer. The books of subscription to the stock of the great bank were opened on the first Monday of July; and about the time that intelligence reached the seat of Government that the stock of the National Bank was all subscribed, and when the Executive believed itself no longer in need of the assistance of the local banks, about this time, I say, (22d July, 1816,) the Treasury made its official communication to the banks—a communication carrying to every auditor a distinct and well understood meaning, in addition to everything expressed on its face. Yes; we find the communication consisting of propositions, &c., but all men could read the sense, not expressed, thus: that it would be in vain to petition Congress to postpone the day of promptitude beyond the 20th of February, in order to stay the drain of dollars from the State banks, to fill the vaults of their formidable rival; for that the Executive power, which had theretofore been irresistible, would be hostile to every such attempt.

The State banks had in view to postpone their specie payments until after all the specie instalments of the capital of the National Bank should be paid in; and the public, as well as the banks, entertained the suspicion, of the subscribers of the United States Bank lying in wait for their specie. But, in the Fall of 1816, the men of the National Bank, who daily became more familiar with the dexterous speculations so common in corporations of trade and exclusive rights, found themselves destitute of the power or disposition to pay either the funded debt or a specie part of the second instalment; on which they, by intrigue among themselves, prompt the Executive to adopt such measures as would impel the local banks to bring their public debt suddenly into market, so as to enable the stockjobbers to acquire it at a reduced price. Let gentlemen again examine the Treasury letter of 29th November, 1816, and acknowledge my conjecture correct, or account for the conduct of the Executive.

That letter, in speaking of the ability of the banks to return to specie payment, by a reduction of their circulating paper, remarks, that "the requisite reduction of the circulating paper may be effected by the State banks, either by curtailing their discounts or by the sale of the public debt, of which they are known to be the holders." And that "curtailment of discounts has been the only process resorted to by them, where any effort has been made to prepare for the resumption of specie payments." The letter enters upon arguments to show that the banks would sustain no loss by selling their public debt instead of curtailing their discounts, and expresses indignation against the conduct of the banks and the practice of curtailing discounts, as productive of great individual suffering, which the banks disregarded, and pronouncing, at the same time, that reason, humanity, and sound policy, all united against the curtailment of bank discounts. I ask, whether such a letter, and from such a source, has ever before been witnessed? I ask, in the name of all that is just and sacred, from whence arose the difference, to the Executive, between a return to specie payments by curtailment of discounts and the sale of public debt; and I demand the reason of this unhallowed and rude Executive interference in the interior policy of our State institutions, that, by the acknowledgment of the Treasury, were honestly preparing to meet their specie engagements, by gradually calling in the debts justly due them? I will not for a moment harbor the evil thought, of a wish by the Executive to render the local banks unpopular by these loud complaints of individual hardship; but, to show the inconsistency attending such complaints, when coming from the Treasury, it is only necessary to appeal to the same letter, where the advice, that the State banks should sell their public debt, is enforced from the consideration that the precious metals had, in a certain late interval, continued to flow into the country from abroad, in quantities sufficient to reduce the premium on specie, &c. If, then, the stock of precious metals of the country was so replenished that many millions of public debt might suddenly and safely be thrown into the market, and sold for hard cash without risking loss, let me ask, whether the same abundant supply of specie would not have enabled the bank debtors to make payments, by which their debts might be gradually diminished?

The Treasury and National Bank, in the Fall and Winter of 1816-17, exhibited by their relations, each to the other, a singular spectacle. The Treasury acknowledging itself at once the protector and dependant of the new institution, makes a voluntary tender of a profusion of Government favors, which the bank declines, but finds itself dumb to every inquiry for the motives of its refusal. The Treasury having in vain urged the local banks to resume specie payments on the 20th February, instead of the 1st July, determined, after the 20th February, to refuse the paper of the non-paying banks, and make the National Bank the exclusive receptacle of the revenue, which would draw to it, in addition to its business paper, and ordinary loans, the whole occupation of discounting for the accommodation of the debtors to the Treasury for duties, and thus enable it to employ advantageously the $4,200,000 specie, which should be in its vaults in January, 1817, and the $7,000,000 of specie which it would hold in July of the same year. But the National Bank, knowing its own secrets, and that a collusion subsisted between itself and its stockholders, by which the second specie payment would not be made as required by the charter, and that, if the Treasury refused the State bank notes, it would devolve on the great bank the necessity of making such numerous loans, as would, within a few weeks, or indeed a few days, draw from its vaults every dollar of the specie received on the first instalment, without even the possibility of extending to the speculating stockholders the enormous accommodations they had in view—it had, therefore, no resort, but to wrestle with the Treasury in support of the credit of the State banks; and, although by this deceptive conduct, it was saved from the ruin of its own delinquency, in failing to comply with the instalments required by its charter, it has encountered the hardship of appearing before our select committee, with a claim to merit for its pretended magnanimity in relation to the local banks. The Treasury still persevered in its courtly offers to the new bank, and to relieve it from the peril of ruin by the loss of specie, on the contemplated refusal of State bank paper, addressed it with a proposal to aid its operations by the issue of Treasury paper, receivable in payment of duties, and to be loaned by the bank, for Government, under circumstances by which the specie might not be endangered. This offer also was declined, from the intimate knowledge which the bank had of its own secrets. It knew that the small compensation it would be entitled to for loaning the Government's paper would scarcely increase the stock dividends, and that without a larger dividend the price of stock must diminish, which would be ruinous, or at least injurious, to the speculators who controlled its operations. It moreover knew that the loans which the fifth of specie, paid by the first instalment, could afford, would not furnish a dividend to increase the price of stock. Its policy, therefore, was to have the Treasury balances against the old banks transferred to it; to indulge the old banks, on their agreement to pay an interest, which would swell the dividends without the risk of danger, in case Government would continue to receive the State bank paper in the collection of the revenue. Hence, the new bank turned from the Treasury offers, and sought a correspondence with the State banks; proposing that they should humor the Executive by agreeing to pay specie on the 20th February, and that it would draw from the Treasury all the balances against them, and indulge them until the 1st July, (their own time,) on receiving interest in the interval.

The times of the payment of the instalments to the Bank of the United States were fixed by the charter; the books were opened the first Monday of July, 1816, at which time it is believed a great portion of the stock was subscribed. One instalment was then payable, and the two others on the corresponding days of January and July, 1817. Yet, by some calculation which I have never been able to understand, the instalments were not considered as due until the 23d January, 1817, and the 23d July. It is well known that the State banks, from a view of the charter, fixed on the first day of July for the resumption of specie payments, on a supposition that it was the time at which the last instalment would be received by the National Bank. Whether the bank thus past dated the instalments to overreach the period fixed by the State banks, and to give its subscribers three weeks' play on the vaults of the local banks to raise the specie of the last instalment, or whether such feats of ingenuity are customary in the intercourse among these moneyed companies, I am unable to say. I am, however, willing to say, that I should not condemn the bank, were this its only transgression.

I will now, sir, pray your attention to the agreement of the 31st January, 1817, between the Bank of the United States and the incorporated banks of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, and Norfolk, by which the latter banks yield to the proposal to pay specie on the 20th February instead of the 1st July. The second proposition of that agreement, by which the balances against those banks were transferred from the Treasury to the United States Bank, was duly performed by it, being altogether to its advantage, and to the prejudice of the State banks, by the amount of interest received by the one and paid by the other. By the third proposition, the Bank of the United States was not to demand those balances until it should discount for individuals (other than those having duties to pay) six millions, as prescribed by the terms of the contract. There is no express stipulation binding the United States Bank to discount for those having duties to pay, but every one who reads will be convinced that all parties expected it was to afford those discounts; yet the United States Bank so contrived, by encouraging the receipt of floating State bank notes at the Treasury, as to make it unnecessary to afford accommodations to the importers, although, from the circumstance of the revenue bonds being payable at the United States Bank and its branches, it was expected that many applications would have been made for loans as they fell due.

Our Executive Government was a party to this arrangement; one feature of which carries with it an idea irreconcilable with justice or good report. I mean the second proposition—which bestows on this new corporation a claim of interest against the State banks, on the balances due the Government, without any compensation to the Treasury—against all previous practice, in behalf of speculators, and to the prejudice of the public. It is not denied that the United States Bank ought to have received interest, if the balances had been received as a general deposit, on which the Government could have been at liberty to draw at pleasure, either for specie or the paper of the National Bank; but this was not the case, for, by the exception contained in the second proposition, the United States was to draw from the State banks such parts of said balances as might be wanted by the Treasury, and consequently had no right, in any event, to draw on the National Bank for any part of the balance for which it received interest. The transaction remained precisely as if the State bank paper had been in the Treasury, to be used or not, at the pleasure of Government, during all the time the banks were paying interest on it to the new bank. It amounted, in truth, to the gift of an unwarrantable speculation by the Executive to the bank.

When viewed in another light, the agreement of the 31st January, 1817, was a palpable fraud by the United States Bank on the State banks. By the terms of the charter of the former, its second specie instalment was payable in January, and all parties well knew that the State banks the more readily assented to the contract in consequence of the understanding that the four million two hundred thousand dollars, the specie part of the first and second instalments, had been paid into the vaults of the United States Bank, and consequently was not to be drawn from the mutual resources of the other institutions; whereas the directors and stockholders of the United States Bank, with a full knowledge of the existence of this expectation on the other side, and at the very time whilst negotiating the agreement, were making a collusive arrangement to accredit the subscribers at least sixty days for the specie of the second instalment, which would authorize its payment after the 20th of February, when it might be taken from the State banks.

I now proceed to examine whether the charter of the National Bank has been violated by the omission to pay the second and third instalments of the capital, as prescribed by the act of incorporation. The third section of the act declares that the sums subscribed shall be payable and paid in the manner following—that is to say, seven millions of dollars thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in gold coin of Spain or the dominions of Spain, and twenty-one millions of dollars thereof in like gold or silver coin, or in the funded debt of the United States. And further, that “the payments of the said subscriptions shall be made and completed by the subscribers respectively, at the times and in the manner following—that is to say, at the time of subscribing, there shall be paid five dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin as aforesaid, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin or funded debt; at the expiration of six calendar months from the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of ten dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin or funded debt; at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of ten dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, and twenty-five dollars more, in coin or funded debt.”

The terms of the law to which I have thus adverted, prescribe not only the amount of funds to be advanced as capital, but the time of payment and the quality or sort of funds; and, judging both from the letter and spirit of the law, we are bound to pronounce that the time and quality of the funds were as material and important in the view of the Legislature, as the quantity. It was certainly essential that the whole one hundred dollars of each share should be paid; and equally necessary that twenty dollars of the second and third instalments should be paid in gold or silver coin, and that the residue should be paid in coin or public debt. But all sides admit that neither the specie nor public debt proportion of the second or third instalments were paid. I therefore insist that a violation and consequent forfeiture of charter has been incurred by that delinquency.

Some gentlemen allege, that the mere negative offence of non-payment of instalments by individual stockholders, or any number of stockholders, should not be deemed a violation of the charter on the part of the bank. But, let it be remembered, that the charge is not rested on the mere delinquency of stockholders, incurred against the will of the bank; for the corporation itself participated in the offence, having, by its corporate and official act, interfered, and dispensed the stockholders from a compliance with the law, by usurping the power of inviting and accepting an arrangement, not only different from, but manifestly contradictory to, the terms of the act of Congress.

An attempt is made to satisfy the public, that the signing and delivery of promissory notes by the stockholders is verily a payment of gold and silver coin, and of public debt, as required by the law; an attempt, supported by an appearance of argument, well suited to the ingenuity of one who would avow his ability to prove that the law might be evaded with impunity. The ingenuity of the bank officers has led them to state the question, with its result, thus: “The charter enabled the bank to commence operations, and, consequently, to make discounts on the receipt of the amount of the first instalment; subscribers as well as others, then, had a right to obtain loans of the bank before the payment of the second instalment. A subscriber having obtained a loan, had a consequent right to draw its amount from the bank in specie, and might immediately return the same specie to the bank in payment of his second instalment. The draft of specie from, and its return to, the bank, being circumstances of mere form, might be dispensed with, and the mere note of the subscriber accepted in lieu of coin, as he could, by turning round, convert the proceeds into coin.”

In answer to these turns and twists of ingenuity, I would remind gentlemen that this charter (as every other law) must be so construed, as that no part of it shall be void or insignificant; and that, whilst one part of the third section requires that a certain proportion of each instalment shall be paid in specie, another part of the same section expressly requires that the aggregate amount of the specie part of the capital shall be seven millions of dollars, in gold or silver coin. Now, the arguments by which I am opposed, although unsound, would sustain a better color if the clauses, requiring the payment of ten dollars specie of the first and ten dollars specie of the second instalment, stood unconnected from every other part of the law; but, taking the whole third section in view, we find not only an obligation to pay a certain proportion of successive instalments in specie, but to pay them in such manner as will produce an aggregate of seven millions of dollars in gold and silver coin; a result at which we could never arrive by paying, and redrawing and repaying the same or identical pieces of coin. The argument on the other side is inadmissible; as, by seeking to show the discharge of an instalment without the actual advance of specie, it would necessarily make nugatory the provision which calls for specie. This false notion of successive payments, by paying, and shifting, and repaying the same dollar, so as to pay a debt of three dollars in full, and yet remain indebted two dollars, acquires its chiefest force from the dash of presumption of the speculator, in disconcerting his opponent by hardihood of assertion; for, assuming the act of Congress requiring the actual payment of specie as a text or early principle of argument, the speculator openly apprizes us that he means from hence to carry you to the conclusion that the law does not require the actual payment of specie, and thus to contradict the first principle he had assumed or acknowledged.

Permit me now to place the argument before noticed in its true light. The speculator then acknowledges his obligation to pay $7,000,000 in gold or silver to the bank, but he claims a distinct, separate, unconnected right—a right to obtain a loan; by the exercise of which, he virtually exempts himself from the force of his obligation. I then accept his acknowledgment of obligation to pay the $7,000,000 in specie, and yield to him the right to obtain loans, in consequence of which he shall take all the benefit he asks; the sum of all which is, that his offence or delinquency of non-payment of specie is so intermingled or amalgamated with the exercise of a right, with which he is invested, that it may be difficult or impossible to distinguish the offence or wrong of his delinquency in one case, from the exercise of his right on the other occasion.

But, although the imagination may be puzzled by hypothetical cases, wherein it may be difficult to distinguish the commission of crime from the exercise of right, there is fortunately no such ambiguity as regards the conduct of the United States Bank. It has, in intercourse with its stockholders, separated very distinctly the offence of delinquency from any supposed general exercise of right. It has informed the stockholder that he had no perfect or absolute right to obtain loans, inasmuch as no one could claim a right to borrow without the consent of the lender; that, without its assent, his pretended right was a nullity; that it would only yield its consent on the condition of his agreeing that he would not pay the second specie instalment, or redeem his faith, pledged to itself, the Treasury, the Government, or American people, as prescribed by the inconvenient stipulations of the charter. To prove this, I demand your attention to the resolutions of the board of directors, of the 18th and 27th of December, 1816, by which the corporation agrees to discount “for the accommodation of the stockholders exclusively, and to the amount of their respective proportions of the payments, in coin, of the second instalment of the capital of the bank.” And, again, “that the loans should be made only to stockholders paying in full the second instalment.” I also refer to the form of hypothecation of stock, prescribed by the corporation, by which the stockholder was made to acknowledge “that he had obtained a loan of the said bank for the specie proportion of the second instalment of the capital thereof, due by him on that day.” Again, the cashier of the mother bank sends this form of mortgage to the branch bank at Baltimore, with this notice: “Enclosed you have the form used at this bank, of an engagement to be entered into by those who obtain an accommodation for the specie part of the second instalment.” I appeal also to the evidence accompanying the report of the select committee, from which it is manifest that the bank was not, in consequence of any ordinary operations of banking, placed in the unfortunate situation of being forced to receive from the left hand of the stockholder the dollars he had withdrawn from the vault by his right; but, on the contrary, the avowed purpose of the institution was to dispense with the law—dispense with the specie required by the charter, and receive the note or bond of the party, in lieu of cash. In truth, the remission of the specie instalments was a criminal and detestable collusion between the bank and the stockjobbing portion of its subscribers, in fraud and prejudice of the Government, the public, and the widows and orphans—those orphans of whom we now hear so much—who are made to weep and plead for this combination of speculators, that they may again incur the risk of being cheated by partners that have not capital to risk, or are unwilling to risk it.

A gentleman from South Carolina, in speaking with reference to the defalcation of the second instalment, in the desultory debate which occurred in originating the select committee, reminded us that the non-payment of the second instalment had been agitated in the fourteenth Congress, and seemed to consider that circumstance as affording a bar to prevent us from passing judgment on it. It does appear that, in 1817, the committee on the national currency was directed to inquire into this affair, and actually proceeded the length of inquiring of one of the directors, by a polite note, how the thing was, and afterwards made a lengthy report, consisting of a letter from this director, (Mr. Lloyd,) which, in substance, assured the committee that the directors were all honest men, and had committed the crime charged against them with an only eye to the public good; and, being thus convinced, from the mouth of one of the directors, that no harm was intended, the committee asked the House to discharge it from further inquiry into such a delicate subject. But this House made no decision on the propriety or wrong of the conduct of the bank: on the contrary, it suffered the business to lie on the table, so as not to bind it from acting as future circumstances might dictate.

I will now remind the House of another topic of the report of the select committee, which manifests, in my humble judgment, a violation of the bank charter. The president and cashier, as well of the mother bank as of some of the branches, have, under pretence of authority from the board of directors, exercised the power, first, of making discounts on pledges of stock; secondly, of renewing loans on pledges of stock; and, thirdly, of purchasing bills of exchange. These three powers are of the same nature and altitude, although the latter, involving the necessity of judging of the solvency and sufficiency of the parties to the bills, would generally be more susceptible of alarm than the powers to loan and renew loans at a given rate on pledges of stock. But neither of these three powers could be exercised on behalf of the corporation, except by the board of directors. The fourth fundamental article of the charter speaks in language incapable of misconstruction, declaring that no less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, of whom the president shall be one, &c. How, then, can it be pretended, that the President, without the other directors, is to exercise powers which Congress has vested in a number of directors, not less than seven?

The president of the bank has informed the select committee that he considered these operations by himself and the clerk as mere ministerial acts, which might as well have been done by the discount clerk. While I admit that the board had as much pretence to transfer the power of making loans to the clerk, who is not even a director, as to the president and clerk; and hence infer the absurdity of the notion of the board alienating to a stranger the important trusts confided to them by the Government, the stockholders, and the public law, which gave birth to the institution. I also insist that this absurdity is not removed, or softened, by ranking the faculty as a ministerial power. No one who had read and attentively considered the act of incorporation, and who was not a wag, would seek to caricature the corporation by bringing it in comparison with our political Government, and assigning to it departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, or judicial and ministerial. Gentlemen, however, are at liberty to call the powers usurped by the president and cashier ministerial, or by such other denomination as may strike the fancy or square with their judgment; it will, after all names are spent, or under every classification of heads, remain what it was at and after the 8th of August, 1817, (when conferred by the board,) a power to make and renew loans, and discount bills on personal security, which is of the ordinary business of the board of bank directors, and consequently embraced by the letter and spirit of the fourth article of the charter; and, whenever it can be shown that these acts are ministerial, it will follow that the ordinary acts of the directors are also ministerial. The dangerous precedent furnished by this aberration from the constitution of the bank cannot be too strongly deprecated; for, with equal plausibility, might the directors chaffer with or alienate every other important power conferred by the charter. The order of the board defining the description of loans which was put under the control of the president and cashier, was nothing more or less than a by-law of the corporation; in which view the question again only recurs, whether the directors can, through the instrumentality of a by-law, vest in one man, or a stranger, the power of lending the money of the corporation, which the charter has virtually declared shall not be loaned by less than seven directors.

The select committee has reproached, in strong terms, two practices of the corporation, that of the subdivision of shares and the consequent increase of votes for directors, by the overgrown stockholders, and the speculations in public stock by the directors, whose official stations subjected their characters and motives to the lash of censure. With the honorable committee I follow suit, in its moral disrelish of the intrigue of increasing votes by colorable transfers of stock, and its abhorrence of inordinate speculations by officers who had control of the institution; yet my distaste in this respect confines itself to moral censure, for there is no law to prohibit the wealthy stockholder from using his utmost influence in elections, by so arranging his shares as to count the greatest number of votes; nor have the president or directors been prohibited from buying and selling stock, as other members of the community; and I had thought that history, if not experience, had taught our Government, that corporations of trade, with their hosts of officers and servants, were at all times prepared to commit every offence which avarice could instigate, except when restrained by the force of a wholesome police. The fault, then, rests on the head of this Government, which has created and sent forth this mighty corporation of avarice, with all the exclusive privileges which could render it odious and dangerous, and without those checks which a due regard to public security imperiously required.

The 14th page of the report of the committee discloses a transaction of usury on the part of the bank, which, if imputed to any private man, would assuredly consign his character to infamy. The bank, in this instance, affects to make a loan, by discounting a note of $20,000, payable in sixty days, and receives the whole interest thereon, as if it had actually loaned the money in hand, whereas it only advanced a post note, payable also at sixty days, by which the bank was not to advance a dollar before the note it discounted would become payable, and, as the discounted note and post note became payable on the same day, the nominal borrower might have claimed interest of the bank, with as much grace and justice as the bank claimed and actually received it of him; and, this, it seems, is only a single instance of what the bank frequently practised. Indeed the directors on the 30th January, 1817, adopted advisedly a resolution to enter extensively into the practice. The report hesitated to pronounce the transaction usurious; the hesitation, sir, of a moment, a fitting instant; for I am satisfied that the superior intelligence and forensic acquisitions of the members of that committee would, with less than five minutes reflection, have dissipated all doubt of the true character of this affair. Without embarking in legal or technical disquisition (which must always be irksome on this floor) I will venture the assertion, that no member who has turned his attention to the subject will deny that the transaction was usurious, not merely in taking more than legal interest, but in taking any interest whatever. The committee has recommended no provision in relation to this scandalous depravity, from a supposition that the parties have their remedy in the courts of justice. Here, with all deference, I must venture to believe the committee is mistaken, and to hazard an opinion that we have here found a mischief that will haunt our country until this mighty institution shall be no more. How shall the injured party acquire redress? This Government has neither inserted anything in the charter nor passed any other law to afford him redress, and probably is unable to do so, for the affair having transpired in the interior of a State, between citizens of the same State, neither the Constitution of the United States, nor any law we could constitutionally pass, could give the Federal courts jurisdiction; and I understand that the friends of the bank contend that the State Legislatures have no authority to tax or control the conduct of the United States Bank. But if the State courts had what may be taken as a right of jurisdiction over this bank, it would of necessity be an abstract sort of power, to which the bank would not be tangible. The State punishes the natural persons of its territory for crimes, by fine, imprisonment, or death—it punishes or restrains State corporations by stipulations of charter, and its visitatorial power as the founder of such institutions. If you yield an authority to the State courts to punish the United States Bank, then inform me how the power shall be exercised, or admit its impracticability. The State cannot certainly revoke the charter of the United States Bank, nor can it imprison it. In truth, the laws of the States only recognise and adapt themselves to ideal personages, existing by the enactment of the same public authority which spake those laws into force, and has no more application to this corporation, than to ghosts of the dead.

I differ in opinion with my honorable colleague (Mr. Johnson) who would repeal the bank charter, because he believes that Congress had no Constitutional power to establish a bank. I entertain (as I always did) the conviction that Congress has power to pass a law chartering a bank, and moreover believe that it possesses the power to repeal the act of incorporation, or any other law which it has previously enacted. Gentlemen who believe with me that the charter is Constitutional, and yet contend that Congress has no power to repeal it, must chalk a new course of reasoning, different from that usually pursued by those who have hitherto opposed the extension of Federal power. The customary allegation has been, that this or that power is not of the subject-matter conferred by the Federal Constitution; but the passage of the act of incorporation, in 1816, admits a national bank may be a subject of Federal legislation, and, if so, we may make or repeal laws applicable to that subject. Even those who deny us the power to legislate on banks, will vote for our power to repeal; for, if an unconstitutional law has been passed, it would become our duty, by a declaratory act, to annihilate the illicit force of such a measure. Exclusive of the rules for the government of the bank, the act of incorporation furnishes certain conditions which affect the existence of the institution. The Government agreed to enter into partnership with the other stockholders, and to form a trading company, to deal in exchange, &c., the capital to consist of $35,000,000. One condition not only stipulated the advance of twenty-eight millions of dollars, (the capital of the concern,) by the subscribers, but required that the funds should consist of a certain quality—so much in specie, and the residue in specie or public securities—which condition was not less essential, in calling for quality, than with regard to quantity. Another important feature of this condition was, that those funds should be collected into an aggregate capital within a limited time—six and twelve months. But the essential conditions, thus affecting the nature and existence of the institution, have failed, by the non-compliance of the subscribers, or, more properly speaking, by the default of the corporation, or its controlling officers, who were the legitimate representatives of the collective subscribers. It is true, the corporation was authorized to commence operations on the payment of the first instalment of eight millions four hundred thousand dollars of specie and stock. This sum, however, was considered as only a fraction of the capital; and the legislative expectation dwelt as strongly on the second and third as the first instalment, and considered its advance and quality as conditions which must have been material, as the amount and sort of capital is always material in the formation of companies of limited partnership. The advance of the first instalment, in the language of municipal lawyers, would be a condition precedent, whilst the payment of the second and third instalments were properly conditions subsequent; and it will not be denied that conditions subsequent are as material to defeat an estate, or right, as conditions precedent. If there has been a non-performance of the conditions affecting the very existence of the corporation, nothing more can be necessary, on our part, than a declaratory act of legislation, apprizing society that, the conditions being unperformed, the company of subscribers are not entitled to exercise or continue the corporate powers, which could not be claimed except on a supposition of a performance of conditions. In illustration of this idea, let us imagine a non-payment of the first instalment required by the charter, and that the subscribers, after paying but a tenth of that instalment, had usurped the powers of a corporation, under pretence of the charter: would any gentleman doubt the power or propriety of enacting a law declaring the non-performance, and announcing the invalidity of the charter? Congress has the same right to announce, by a declaratory law, to the community over which it presides, the non-performance of the conditions of the two last instalments, and to make such provisions as will insure a just distribution of the funds which would revert to its individual owners. Gentlemen may talk of the unconstitutional strides of convicting the corporation or its members of offences without judicial investigation or jury trial. In the view I have this moment presented, neither the corporation nor its members are convicted of crimes, as the mere non-performance of a condition is no crime; for if you give or promise me an estate, on my performance of a certain act, and I omit the performance, no one imagines that I am to be charged with crime, or dragged to court, or tried by a jury, for my neglect: the issue of the affair is, that I cannot claim the estate without showing a performance. A visitatorial power is found to exist somewhere over all corporations—a power competent to correct its abuses, or revoke its charter when violated and forfeited. In England, corporations are frequently created by the mere grant of the Executive magistrate; and of such corporations, the Court of King's Bench (which in that country is, or originally was, an arm of the Executive department) is the visitor, and, by mandamus or quo warranto, corrects or destroys the corporation; and the Parliament may exercise the same power without the aid of the King's Bench. The act of incorporation here, as regards its nature and incidents, must be interpreted by a reference to the common law, from whence, and not from the civil law, we have borrowed our notions on this subject. At common law, every corporation is subject to the visitatorial power of its founder. But Congress is the founder of this corporation, and therefore possessed of that visitatorial power which, for sufficient cause, may correct or destroy the institution.

I submit another view. This mighty institution had its inception in an act of sovereignty; and, having derived its existence from legislation, it seems peculiarly fit, or probably absolutely necessary, that its fate should be sealed by a like act of legislation, if it be worthy of death. The courts of England, by judgment, will oust corporations of their privileges, where those privileges are merely derived from the Executive Magistrate, or for good cause repeal or revoke other Executive grants; but the courts have never revoked acts of Parliament, or grants contained in them. So if Congress, by a general law, authorizes the President to grant lands to soldiers, and he grants land to one who was not a soldier, the courts would repeal the grant, as having issued without authority. But if Congress by a particular law grants land to an individual, the courts would not revoke the grant for any cause; for this would be to repeal a law, and consequently the exercise of legislative power. If it be said that Congress has conferred the power on the court by the act of incorporation to repeal the charter, I reply that this charter is nevertheless an act of Congress; that its repeal must be an act of legislation; and that Congress cannot confer on the courts the power of legislation.

The corporations of England and of every State of the Union are subject in some shape to visitatorial powers, by which they are restrained or destroyed, when they pervert the ends for which they were called into being. But this bank, if not subject to the legislative authority of Congress, is incapable of subjection by any power on earth, and may with impunity extend its ravages of injustice on the people and States of this continent, from Maine to Mexico, and laugh into insignificance the Federal compact which has hitherto afforded protection to the people, and to which the Federal family has sworn obedience. If then this great corporation has thus become too powerful for the Government, and acknowledges itself subject to no law, and yet retains all its capacity to sin, I would aim a blow at its existence, even at the risk of wrenching out of joint the Constitution of the Union, which we all revere.

The advocates of this bank and of the old Bank of the United States deduce the authority of this Government to establish a bank from its powers over the Treasury and fiscal concerns of the Union. Admitting, as I do, the correctness of their deduction, permit me to ask whether the authors of American polity could have anticipated that Congress would ever find itself disabled to make, repeal, alter or modify, any of the laws in relation to the Treasury.

Conceiving that the bank has forfeited its charter, not only by a non-compliance with the conditions, but by the commission of crime, and that Congress has power to repeal the act of incorporation, I have never had a moment's hesitation of the expediency of the repeal. It has been said that we ought not to repeal, because the good faith of the Government is pledged to this institution. What is the import or force of this pledge of good faith? These expressions are resorted to on such variety of occasions, of late, as might warrant a suspicion that they were susceptible of application to all cases; and, if so, ought not to be used in any case. Is it that moral obligation, perfect or imperfect, imposed on Government in consequence of a promise or promises? Be it so, unless you afford me another definition. But, if the Bank has failed to comply with the express condition on which the promise of the Government depended, and has, by the enormity of repeated crimes, violated those wholesome conditions implied in all charters, how can it speak of that good faith which vanished whenever the bank ceased to dwell under its protection? The charter being forfeited, we are remitted, if we think proper to enforce the forfeiture, to the free condition of the Congress that granted the charter, with the additional advantage of two years' experience of the harm evinced by the bank in its infancy, and the ability to anticipate our fate from its growing strength. When viewing the alleged violations of charter, I hold myself bound to yield to every fair claim or expectation of the corporation, respecting its connexion with Government, without bias from popular feeling. But having found a violated and forfeited charter, and a corporation begging reprieve from the fatal evils of its own wrong, then it is I find the hand of my constituents on me; nor will I be so deaf to the wishes of the people or the dictates of justice as to raise the monster from the dead, or relieve it by renewing its capacity to visit the public with its complicated mischiefs.

I have acknowledged my utter dislike to corporations of traffic, by which a few favored personages are admitted to privileges from which the people are excluded; by which a few are permitted to trade to an indefinite extent on a definite fund without subjecting their estates to liability for their debts, whilst the rest of the people are liable, in their persons and whole fortunes, on every of their contracts. I dislike these corporations, because, the rights of all men being equal, every grant of exclusive rights to patent combinations or companies, being carved out of the previous claim of others, operates as a proportionate alienation of the liberty of all other persons in the community. But, above all, I abhor the thing we call a bank bonus, it being the price at which a legislative body sells to a combination of speculators peculiar political, civil, or commercial privileges from which the people are prohibited. The price offered and accepted at the creation of this corporation was $1,500,000. The old Bank of the United States never insulted the Government by the offer of a bonus or bribe. Say nothing of the pious or useful objects to which such money may be appropriated, (for it can never be just to obtain money by injustice,) let the disbursement of such money be such as it may. If corporations are absolutely necessary, the public good would justify their creation without the immorality of selling political rights at auction. But, the plea of necessity never holds in these bargains, for, however proper corporations may be, the bonus is never offered for a mere charter, but always in consideration of some peculiar and exclusive privileges which may be dispensed with. This notion of a bonus, lately so familiar as to startle nobody, has found its precedent in Europe, the institutions from whence are annually gaining popularity with the mercantile class of this country. The Bank of England is bound to renew its charter each twenty years, by the advance of pecuniary advantages to that Government; but it is due to the character of our English ancestors to remember that their early resort to this degrading practice was the consequence of misfortune and evils, which gives them, at least, the show of an excuse, to which our Government has no pretension. I remember the circumstances attending one renewal of the English bank charter, which are not materially different from those accompanying all the earlier renovations of charter. In 1708, Parliament, by its vote, granted to the Queen upwards of £2,000,000 for maintaining the forces in her pay in Spain and Portugal, for subsidies payable to her allies, et cetera. Whilst this measure was depending, the Ministers, having exhausted their ingenuity, found it impossible to raise even a moiety of the sum, although the whole was indispensable. At that critical juncture the Bank appeared before Parliament, as a saving angel, with propositions for a renewal of charter, and an offer to advance the sums wanted. It is scarcely necessary to observe that the offer was accepted. We have no such palliative to cover our departure from principle in respect to this bank. We copy the vices of Europeans, without the trimmings to make them passable; or, in truth, endeavor, in our day of national prosperity, to imitate the traits of evil deformity which circumstances, and not choice, have imposed on European nations.

It is no cause of surprise that the State banks in every quarter of the continent are terrified by the threatening aspect of this institution of thirty-five millions. The Government of the Union has also entered into partnership with the speculators of this great bank, and not only become the proprietor of one-fifth of the stock, but has presented the company with the whole national revenue, as a capital to trade with, in exchange. In short, the strong box of the nation has been delivered and locked in the bank vaults. No rival institution can compete with one which finds itself in partnership with the national Government, and in possession of its revenues. Not only the State banks, but the State governments, must be inspired with apprehensions of insecurity from such a combination of influential force, and gentlemen who have, on other occasions, displayed so much ingenuity and eloquence on this floor in defence of State sovereignties and State rights, will, I hope, see in the question now on hand an object worthy of their exertions; they will not, I am convinced, after having rescued the States from open attacks, tamely suffer the General Government to organize and strengthen a moneyed aristocracy which would devour the State banks, intimidate the State governments, and swallow the annual revenues of the country. For my own part, I shall, with a cheerful conscience, vote for the resolution of my honorable colleague, (Mr. JOHNSON,) to repeal the bank charter.

Mr. LOWNDES then intimated a wish to make some remarks on the subject, which, late as it was, he would proceed to do, at once, if the Committee were disposed now to hear him; but, if they were desirous of rising, he would give way.

A motion being made to that effect, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 19.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Mississippi, praying that provision may be made for quieting the claims to land in that part of said State, formerly comprised within the province of West Florida, derived from the British Government, so far as the said grants interfere with those derived from the Spanish Government; which said petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LITTLE, from the joint committee upon the subject of the public printing, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred bills of the Senate, of the following titles to wit: "An act for the relief of David Henley;" and "An act for the relief of James H. Clarke," reported the said bills without amendment; and they were respectively committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill to divide the United States into four districts for the regulation of the coasting trade, and of the amendment thereto proposed, by Mr. SILSBEE, for reducing the number of districts from four to two—

Mr. MILLS moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; in which motion he was supported by Mr. ORR; and opposed by Messrs. SILSBEE, WHIT-MAN, HOLMES, and LINCOLN. This debate was confined to the representation from Massachusetts, and turned principally on considerations connected with the relative interests of the District of Maine and of Massachusetts proper. The motion to postpone was negatived, but not before an effort had been made, in order to end the debate, to lay the bill on the table, which was negatived.

The question was then taken on the amendment moved by Mr. SILSBEE, as above, and decided in the affirmative.

The motion was then renewed to lay the bill on the table, and carried.

The bill making further provision for the sale of the public lands; and the bill for designating boundaries of land districts, and establishing offices for the sale of lands remaining unsold in Indiana and Ohio, were received from the Senate, severally twice read, and referred.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: An act to regulate the pay of the Army, when employed on fatigue duty; An act for the relief of John B. Timberlake; and, An act to enable the people of the Territory of Alabama, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, were severally read a third time, the last as amended, and passed.

ARKANSAS TERRITORY.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to establish a separate Territorial government in the southern part of the Missouri Territory.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, with the view of obtaining the erasure of the amendment yesterday adopted, to recommit the bill to a select committee, with instructions to strike out these words: "And all children born of slaves within the said Territory, shall be free, but may be held to service until the age of twenty-five years."

And the question being taken thereon, was decided as follows: For the recommitment 88, against it 88.

There being an equal division, the SPEAKER declared himself in the affirmative; and so the said motion was carried; and Messrs. ROBERTSON, SILSBEE, BURWELL, MILLS, and LOWNDES, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the committee to whom was this day referred the bill establishing a separate Territorial government for the southern part of the Territory of Missouri, with instructions to amend the same, by striking out these words: "And all children born of slaves within the said Territory, shall be free, but may be held to service until the age of twenty-five years," reported the same, amended agreeably to the said instructions.

Mr. MERCER expressed his views of this question in a short speech.

The question was then taken, to concur with the select committee, in striking out the said words, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 87, as follows:

So the House determined, by a majority of two votes, to strike out the clause imposing a restriction on slavery in the proposed new Territory of Arkansas.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision "that, during the existence of the Territorial government of Arkansas, no slaves shall be brought into the said Territory, to remain therein for a longer time than nine months from the date of their arrival."

Mr. PITKIN supported, at some length, the amendment.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am impelled, by a sense of duty to myself, as well as by a hope to be able to throw some light on this subject, to endeavor to exhibit the view which I have taken of it. At this stage of the debate, the House having become weary, I cannot expect to gain much attention; and, had any other gentleman exhibited the view which influences my mind, I should have been silent. Without some explanation, the vote which I am about to give might seem inconsistent with that which I gave in Committee of the Whole, and should have given in the House, on a similar amendment proposed, in the case of the admission of Missouri as a State. I voted in that case against the admission of slavery into that State. I did not so vote, however, in expectation that it would diminish slavery in the United States. I do not view the subject as necessarily involving that question; and, if it be involved in it, I think it can be made manifest that the reasons are in favor of its admission, rather than its rejection, if we would promote emancipation, and provide for the amelioration of the condition of the slaves. No man would abhor more a contrary tendency than I should. I should shudder at the idea of adopting a measure tending to the increase of such misery and wretchedness.

The slaves already in the United States, as the laws now are, can only be increased by procreation. The penalties against further importation, and the measures adopted to enforce them, are such that we cannot reasonably fear that many, if any more, will be smuggled into the Union. The permission of slavery in the Territory of Arkansas will afford no additional facilities to the introduction of this unfortunate race from abroad. The State of Louisiana, already established, lying principally west of the Mississippi, and on the banks of it, and adjoining the Gulf of Mexico, without being under any restriction in this particular, will be the place in which slaves will be smuggled in, if smuggled at all. They could not be smuggled into Arkansas till they had been conveyed three hundred miles through Louisiana.

The natural increase will be the same, whether in one part of the Union or the other; or, if it would be greater in the Western country, it would be the consequence of an ameliorated condition, and therefore not to be regretted, as the cause of humanity would thereby be promoted. This will be obvious to those who have had an opportunity of comparing the slavery on the Atlantic seaboard with that of the Western country. On the seaboard, for from fifty to eighty miles into the country, through the whole of the Southern States, the soil is sterile—and there it is that there is the greatest proportion of slaves, subjected to the most lamentable state of degradation and misery. The produce is trifling and scanty; the market at the same time high. The slave is pinched and stinted, and allowed, in many instances, but his peck of corn per week for his whole subsistence. In the Western country the produce is abundant, and the market poor; the slave is there well fed and happy. The greatest kindness you can do a slave, is to tempt his master to remove with him to the Western country. The master will be bettered in his own condition at the same time, and this also will increase his liberality to his slaves. All travellers, from the Atlantic to the West, are struck with the increased amelioration in their condition, as they progress.

But, sir, there is another point of view in which I would beg my friends to look at this subject. In the degree in which you increase the proportion of the free beyond that of the slave population, in the same ratio you increase the chance for emancipation, final and total. To prove this, we need only to look at some of our sister States. The majority, consisting of non-slaveholding individuals, in those States, has compelled the minority gradually to let go their hold upon this species of property. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, in this way, have nearly rid themselves of this reproach upon humanity. The best mode, therefore, to promote the cause of a final emancipation, would be to suffer the slaves to be scattered thinly over the Western States. These States will be peopled, in much the largest proportion, by those who do not, and who are too poor to hold slaves. It is the laboring class of the community, and the industrious yeomanry of our country, who will emigrate thither. The men of wealth, and those are principal slaveholders, will not remove. Hence, the case in the Western country, as it respects the slaves, will be perfectly similar to that which brought about emancipation in the States before mentioned.

In Missouri it is said that about one-fifth of the population are slaves. These were held, it is said, principally by the French and Spanish people, at the time of its cession to the United States. The population now pouring in there, consists of the hardy yeomanry of the North. It will soon be the case there, that the proportion of slaves and of slaveholders will be comparatively trifling. Can any man believe that in such case they will not there do as has been done in the other States? The majority having the power, will they not compel the minority gradually to rid themselves of this species of property? I believe, sir, it is not in the nature of man to do otherwise. Were no restriction to be imposed on Missouri, even there it is as fixed as fate that slavery must, ere long, be abolished. If, then, it were proper to consult the cause of humanity only, in disregard of every other consideration, we should encourage the dispersion of the slaves now in the Union to the utmost of our power.

What, sir, would be the inevitable consequence of cooping them up within certain limits? In such case the poorer whites would emigrate; the slaves and slaveholders would remain. While the free population would remain stationary, or diminish, the slaves would increase. The result of which would be, as it ever has been, that the slave must be treated with more rigor; he must be kept ignorant, be humbled, and debased; for, sir, people must and will consult their own safety. If the slaves should become sufficiently numerous to render it possible to regain their freedom, if they are not degraded to the character of brutes, they will be tempted to combine and destroy their oppressors. In such cases the white people dare not admit of the emancipation of slaves, lest it should afford an opportunity to the emancipated, by means of obstruction and observation, to become capable of heading and exciting the slaves against their masters. Hence, in some States, emancipation has been prohibited by law. The condition of a slave in such cases is wretched, indeed.

This, then, sir, is not a question which ought to be decided under the apprehension that it will increase the horrors of slavery. If it affects the question, it is wholly the other way.

As to the question, which has been agitated with so much zeal, relative to the power of the United States, on the admission of a new State, to cause a stipulation to be agreed to, preventing slavery or requiring its gradual abolition, I can entertain no doubt. We certainly have this power. The Territories are under the absolute control of the United States. We have the power to admit them into the Union as States or not. Before admitting them, we may require any stipulation relative to their internal police or municipal regulations that we please, as a condition on which we will agree to their admission. We could not require anything, I admit, repugnant to the fundamental articles of the Federal Government—such as that they should not be represented in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and have Electors of President, &c., the same as the other States. Whatever any other State would be entitled to by the express provisions of the Federal Constitution, we could not deny to a newly admitted State. Nothing will now prevent an agreement with any of the individual States in the Union as to any municipal regulation, deemed proper or necessary for the use of any portion of the citizens of the Union—and certainly the same may be stipulated for on the admission of a new State, as a condition of its admission. Gentlemen have said that, although we might compel them to stipulate in their constitutions that slavery should not be tolerated, yet, nothing would prevent their altering their constitution after such admission; and that we should have no means of enforcing the regulation—and that we cannot make stipulations that we cannot enforce. In this I believe there is a mistake. It is true, perhaps, that the United States could not, by any act of legislation, enforce the observance of the regulation. But, sir, suppose it should be attempted to hold an individual as a slave, in contravention of such a stipulation, would he not, and could he not, apply to the courts of the United States, by habeas corpus, or otherwise, and obtain his liberation?

These regulations are no novelty. They have heretofore been adopted on the admission of new States. Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have been subjected to them. Besides the regulations prohibiting slavery, we have been in the constant habit of requiring other stipulations of the newly admitted States. We have required that they should not tax the lands of the United States, and the lands sold by the United States, for five years after the sale. Now, sir, the right to levy and collect taxes is an attribute of sovereignty which could no more be abridged, on the admission of a new State, than the power to admit slavery. If we can require stipulations for the one, we can for the other—and our right heretofore has never been doubted to do either. Should a State, after its admission, in contravention of the compact, as it may be called, proceed to tax United States lands, or lands sold by the United States, before the expiration of the five years, the United States could do nothing by way of enforcing it otherwise than by a resort to the tribunals of law for relief.

This, then, is the power which we have, and can exercise whenever we deem it proper. In some cases we have exercised it in relation to the inhibition of slavery; and in others not. We have, I trust, exercised the power in cases which have properly required it; and again have omitted it in cases in which it should have been omitted. It is, then, on the admission of a new State, a question, solely, of expediency and policy. We are now to determine whether we shall exercise this power in this case.

We should consider that we have, by our common and joint funds, acquired a large tract of vacant territory west of the Mississippi; that it is valuable to our country as furnishing a fertile region for the citizens of our country to resort to for the purpose of bettering their conditions, acquiring property, and providing for their children. The two great sections of the Union, to wit, the slaveholding and the non-slaveholding sections, have an equal right to its enjoyment. By permitting slavery in every part of it, the non-slaveholding portion will be deprived of it; if not entirely, certainly in a very great degree. On the other hand, if the people of the South cannot carry their slaves with them when they emigrate, the benefit will be equally lost to them.

We must, then, go on as we have begun; admitting some States with, and some without, any restriction. We have already admitted Louisiana, lying principally west of the Mississippi, without any restriction, for the benefit of our Southern brethren. We have now decided to admit Missouri, with the restriction, with a view, in some measure, I trust, to the benefit of our Northern brethren. Why may we not continue in the same way, admitting States off against the non-slaveholding States, westerly, with the restriction, and off against the slaveholding States, without it.

Gentlemen have said, that people of the North emigrate to the South, and readily assimilate, and become slaveholders; and that the existence of slavery forms no objection. This may be the case, and undoubtedly is, with certain individuals, and particularly such as are able to hold slaves. But it is far from being the case generally. The people from the North, who emigrate, are the industrious yeomanry, who till the earth with their own hands, and are seldom, if ever, able to purchase slaves; and whose spirit of freedom would revolt at the idea of being compelled to work side by side with slaves. For proof of this, look at the States of Ohio and Kentucky. The fertility of soil and congeniality of climate, for agricultural purposes, is in favor of Kentucky; yet you can scarcely find a Northern man in that State; while Ohio is almost exclusively peopled from the North, and has increased in population much faster than Kentucky. There cannot possibly be any other reason for this, unless it is that Kentucky is a slaveholding, and Ohio a non-slaveholding State.

Gentlemen abhor sectional lines of demarcation between the different descriptions of population in the Union, and so do I. When they can be avoided, I would avoid them. But we have them in relation to this subject already. The line is distinctly marked. It is, I confess, one of our misfortunes. But, sir, it is unavoidable. We have heretofore found it necessary and proper to observe it in forming States north of the Ohio, without admitting, and south of the Ohio with, the admission of slaves. Having so begun, we must continue on. And in doing so, we must, as in the case of every other legislative act, exercise a sound discretion, and do that which shall best comport with the demands of the different and varying interests of the different portions of the Union.

I am, therefore, in favor of no restriction in relation to Arkansas, although I was, and still am, in favor of adopting it in relation to Missouri. The settled part of Arkansas will be south of the southerly line of Kentucky. In my opinion, to do justice to our Southern brethren, they ought to have permission to carry with them their slaves, even further north. But as Missouri extends south to this line, and we could not admit slavery in any part, and not in the whole, there seemed to be no alternative but to confine the admission of slavery to the south of that line.

The gentlemen of the North need have no fears, I believe, that the slaveholding States will become predominant, and prevent our doing all that it may be proper for us to do to prevent this growing evil. We now have the numerical force; we have a majority of ten or fifteen in the representation on this floor as a guarantee against it. This majority will increase upon the taking of every census. By recurring to the census of 1800 and 1810, it will be seen that the increase is from 25 to 30 per cent. against the slaveholding section. Add to this, that the slave portion of the increase gives but three-fifths of the increase to the weight in this House.

Neither have gentlemen any cause of alarm for fear that the gentlemen of the South will be for the repeal of the law prohibiting the importation of slaves. They have hitherto manifested as much of a disposition to put a final stop to that nefarious practice as could have been wished—and no doubt can be entertained of the steadiness of that disposition.

We have no right to interfere in opposition to the determination of the slaveholding States further than the Constitution has authorized. These States were sovereign, and could make what regulations they would as to slavery. They have delegated to us no other authority than that of prohibiting further importation, after a certain period. It is then an evil which we have not created, nor does it even exist and continue by our permission. We are, in fact, by the most solemn obligation, precluded from the right to molest those States in the exercise of this power. Not having the power to prevent it, the iniquity cannot lie at our doors. There is no ground on which we can demand to be their conscience-keepers. They must answer for the wrong, and not we.

Under this view of the subject, I shall deem it my duty not to vote in favor of the restriction in relation to Arkansas—at the same time I shall go any reasonable length with those who would insist upon the restriction in relation to Missouri.

Mr. TAYLOR, then, for reasons which he stated, modified the amendment, to read as follows:

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall hereafter be introduced into the said Territory, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Mr. MERCER, after earnestly, and at some length, supporting his views on this subject, moved to amend the proposed amendment, by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein shall divest the inhabitants of Arkansas of their rights of property in the slaves which they now hold, or the natural increase thereof; nor to entitle to his freedom any slave carried therein, and held there for a period not exceeding nine months."

This motion was negatived without a division; and,

The question being then taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, was determined in the negative—yeas 86, nays 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Anderson, of Pa., Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Clagett, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Elliott, Folger, Fuller, Gage, Gilbert, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hopkinson, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Kirtland, Lawyer, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Strother, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Whitman, and Williams of North Carolina.

Mr. TAYLOR then, after stating that he thought it important that some line should be designated beyond which slavery should not be permitted, &c., moved the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

"That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall hereafter be introduced into any part of the Territories of the United States, lying north of 36 degrees and 30 minutes of north latitude."

Mr. LIVERMORE conceived this proposition to be made in the true spirit of compromise, which ought to be met, but suggested a different line.

Mr. RHEA opposed this amendment, and spoke against any amendment or restriction of the sort, as unconstitutional, and inconsistent with the treaty with France, which transferred to us the territory west of the Mississippi.

Mr. OGLE was against the amendment, because opposed to any compromise by which slavery in any of the Territories should be recognised or sanctioned by Congress.

Mr. STROTHER thought it would be better to withdraw the amendment, and bring forward the principle in a separate bill, and argued in support of his view of the question.

Mr. HARRISON assented to the expediency of establishing some such line of discrimination; but, for reasons which he explained at large, proposed a different one, by way of amendment to the amendment, as follows:

"That all that part of the present Territory of Missouri, lying north of a line to be run due west from the mouth of the river Des Moines to the territorial boundary of the United States, shall form a part of the Territory of Michigan; and the laws now in force in the said Territory as well as the ordinance of Congress prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude in said Territory of Michigan, shall be in force in that part of the Missouri Territory lying north of the said east and west line."

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, was opposed to Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, and to all others of a similar character; and spoke with much earnestness against the proposition at some length, as partial and inexpedient; arguing that, if the principle was wrong in itself, (and the question had been discussed on principle alone,) it ought not to be withheld from one part of the Territory and applied to another; that it was legislating partially, by applying a rule to one portion and a different rule to another portion of citizens having equal rights and placed under similar circumstances. If the rule was wrong at the 25th degree of latitude, it was equally so at the 40th. He argued that it was as impolitic as it was unjust to draw this line; it was proper to let a future Congress act on it, as should then appear expedient; and this opinion, as well as others which he advanced, he maintained at some length.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, gave the amendment his unqualified disapprobation. It was no compromise—its friends asked everything and gave nothing—what they got now was insured to them, and what they conceded now would not be binding on a future Congress, and the same principle might be extended by hereafter inserting it in the constitution of Arkansas when it should become a State. Furthermore, the principle was contrary to the Treaty of Cession with France, and he could not agree to any compromise, even if it were fairly proposed; all of which views he strenuously enforced.

Mr. LIVERMORE replied, and argued at length to show that the compromise was fair and liberal; also that the Treaty of Cession could not bind Congress in this case, as it was out of the power of the Government to admit States into the Union by treaty; that the Territory was purchased, and it was now competent for the Government to dispose of it in any manner whatsoever, either to sell it, recede, &c.

Mr. BEECHER followed in a speech of near an hour in length, entering into an inquiry into the whole subject presented by the various propositions brought forward.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—41

Mr. COBB rose to put an end at once to a debate, which he said was disagreeable to one part of the House, however agreeable it might be to the other; and the end of which, if unchecked, could not be seen, as it was impossible to foretell what number of amendments might be presented. He therefore called for the previous question, to obtain at once a decision on the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was refused by the House—ayes 67, noes 74; when

Mr. TAYLOR, having stated that he perceived from the debate, as well as from conversation, that it was not probable any line would be agreed on by the House, or any compromise of opinion be effected, withdrew his amendment.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

SATURDAY, February 20.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Rees Hill," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the report of the Committee of Claims, made at the last session, on the case of Mary Sears and William B. Stokes.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Post Office Department, made a detailed report, accompanied with sundry documents and statements, which were received; when Mr. H. reported a bill, to amend an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," passed the 30th of April, 1810; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act regulating passenger ships and vessels," made a report on the said amendments; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Ruth Reed; which was read; when Mr. J. reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William Reed, deceased; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill in addition to an act, supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Wilson;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS submitted a joint resolution prescribing the manner in which the vessels of the Navy of the United States shall hereafter be named; [directing that all public vessels now building or to be built, shall be named by the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President, according to the following rule, viz:

Ships of the first class to be called after the States of the Union; those of the second class, after the Rivers of the United States, and those of the third class, after the principal Cities and Towns; taking care that no two vessels in the Navy bear the same name.]

The resolution was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate supplementary to the acts concerning the coasting trade; and the amendments to which were ordered to be engrossed, and, with the bill, to be read a third time.

The bill establishing a separate Territorial government in the Arkansas Territory was read the third time, and passed.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of the Bank of the United States, the motion to repeal the charter of the bank being still under consideration.

Mr. LOWDES, of South Carolina, said, that the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PINDALL,) who had just addressed the Committee, had discussed the policy of the law which chartered the bank, the motives of Congress in passing it, and those of the Executive Government in the measures which had been adopted for carrying it into effect. He would not enter into these topics. The subject was large enough, without digression, to occupy their whole attention for the time which it would be reasonable to appropriate to this debate. If the reputation of the fourteenth Congress, or of the late Administration, could be impaired by observations or circumstances like those which had been adduced, he would say of both, that they were not worth defending. In the course of his remarks, indeed, it was not improbable that he might advert to facts which would repel the conclusions of the gentleman from Virginia, but he would not deviate from the strict line of his argument, to engage in so useless a controversy.

The committee, of which he had had the honor to be a member, had expressed an opinion, in respect to the first operations of the bank, correct enough, perhaps, in its general principle, but erroneous, as it seemed to him, in its application. They say, "that the bank could have proceeded gradually, growing with the growth, and strengthening with the strength of the nation, as it emerged from the evils of the flood of paper issued from the local institutions. The bank could have felt its way, and increased its means with the increasing demands of the country. Such a cautious proceeding would have enabled it to render invaluable service in checking the issue of State banks, and bringing them to the alternative of avowed bankruptcy or to the permanent resumption of specie payments." He was not disposed to deny, that, while a discredited currency was circulated through the country, while the excessive issues of bank paper (of which the war had been the cause or the apology) continued to resist the introduction of real money, the committee were right in supposing that it was the interest of the National Bank to commence its operations slowly, or to postpone them. It was its interest to leave it to the Government to fight the battles against depreciation, and to come in afterwards as a partaker of the victory. Even after the 20th February, 1817, the bank might have pursued the cautious policy of withholding its accommodations from the Government and the people, until the reduction of other paper had made its issues necessary and safe. It might have preferred its interest to its duty. The State banks, unable to comply with the requisitions of Congress, which demanded from them the resumption of specie payments, must have lost their credit with the community. The Government, indeed, might have been embarrassed, the public debtors distressed, and the State institutions have been brought "to the alternative of avowed bankruptcy," but these competitors for public favor and employment would have been removed, and the National Bank would have entered into the full enjoyment of the monopoly which the ruin of every other institution would have prepared. This might have been its interest. But there were other interests to be consulted—those of the Government and the people. The bank had not been established for the purpose of giving to its stockholders the harvest which such a policy might provide. It was the instrument by whose use he hoped to secure the resumption of specie payments—constructed, not for its own sake, but for ours. The act of the Legislature and the proceedings of the Treasury Department would show how incompatible with the objects of its institution would have been that postponement of its operations, or that gradual commencement of them, which was recommended now, when the difficulties of the time were forgotten. The fourteenth Congress was aware that a narrow view of its exclusive interest might induce the National Bank to adopt the policy which the committee had described. The act which they passed provided that, as soon as the amount of the first subscription ($3,400,000) should be received, the bank should thenceforth commence and continue its operations. The twenty-second section reserved to Congress the power, if it should not go into operation before the first Monday in April, (at which time the third instalment was not due,) to declare its charter void. This was the measure of the Legislature to secure the early operation of the bank. Those of the Treasury Department were in entire consonance with its principle.

He must ask the indulgence of the House while he read some extracts from two letters of the Secretary of the Treasury. In a letter to the commissioners for receiving subscriptions, (dated August 15, 1816,) the Secretary says, "It is, indeed, of high importance to the people, as well as to the Government, that the Bank of the United States should be in an organized and active state before the 20th of February next, when the paper of the State banks which have 'not returned to metallic payments must be rejected.' Again:—"It is believed that the Bank of the United States may be in operation before the first day of January next," (before the receipt of the second instalment.)

Mr. Crawford (who, after the date of the last letter, had succeeded to the office of Secretary of the Treasury) writes, on the 29th of November, 1816, to the president of the bank, that "if the State banks do not make a simultaneous effort, it is manifest that, without their co-operation, a national currency, equal to the indispensable demands of the community, cannot be obtained by the 20th of February next." He asks whether "it is possible for the bank to supply the demand of the commercial cities which the collection of the revenue arising from imports and tonnage will create in the interval between the 20th of February and the 1st of July." He suggests that it may be necessary to employ "a Government paper of some description" in that interval, but adds, that "it is most ardently desired by the Government, that the necessity of resorting to the issue of Government paper may be avoided by the resumption of specie payments by the State banks, on or before the 20th of February."

The first object which the Government expected to be attained by the National Bank, was that of throwing into general circulation, by the 20th of February, an amount of notes sufficient to enable the public debtors to comply with their engagements. When it appeared impracticable that the amount or dispersion of these notes should provide for the object, the next resource was to give to those of the State banks a credit which should enable the Treasury to receive them under the resolution of Congress. These banks had refused every proposal for the resumption of specie payments. He would not say they were unwilling, but they were afraid to adopt them. The remonstrances and encouragement of the Government were unavailing. It was then that the National Bank, certainly not in the spirit of narrow jealousy, entered into that compact with the State banks which had been referred to by the gentleman from Virginia. It was impossible to do justice to the conduct of the National Bank, at least for the first year of its operations, without attending to the new obligations in which this compact involved them. Proposed by the Executive Government, and sanctioned by it—required by the interests of the people, and necessary to the credit of the local institutions, there could be no other objection to the act than that it accorded better with the public interest than with that of the stockholders. Under this compact, the bank became bound to discount six millions (exclusive of revenue bonds) before the 20th April, and to sustain, with its unbroken credit and its whole capital, every bank which joined in the arrangement. The effect of this compact was not only to force the bank into earlier operation than a selfish policy might have recommended, but to oblige it to renounce the resource which the State banks might have afforded for the supply of specie. South of New England there was no specie in circulation. The National Bank had engaged to support the credit of the State banks, and, if it produced a demand of their specie, it was bound to aid them by the loan of its own. He made these observations very much with a view to the conduct of the bank in affording facilities for the payment of the instalments upon its stock. But he did not mean yet to engage upon that topic. A necessary consequence of this compact, the committee would see to have been, that, if a large amount of specie was necessary to the operations of the bank, it could be obtained only from foreign countries. Its importation might have been trusted to the gradual contributions of trade, and he believed it would have been better to have been so. But the error of judgment, if it was one, which consisted in the bank's importing specie from abroad, had no character of bad faith. Perhaps it was unnecessary. If it were necessary, it resulted exclusively from a compact which interdicted all reliance upon the specie of the State banks.

If the committee, then, should determine that the early operation of the bank, and its importations of silver, were both of them injudicious—at least they would say that neither was criminal. Perhaps the effect of both was injurious to the stockholder; the country had no right to complain of them. But the second article of the compact had drawn down the severe animadversions of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PINDALL.) He had considered it as obliging the State banks to pay interest for public balances transferred from them to the National Bank, although the National Bank had not undertaken to pay these balances to the Government in its own notes or specie. In other words, he had supposed that the National Bank received interest from the State banks on what had been called the special deposits of the Government. He had admitted it to be fair and right that the bank should receive interest on all balances transferred to it, for which it gave a general credit, and which might at any moment be drawn from it in coin. Now, Mr. L. said he did not hesitate to affirm that these were the only balances on which interest had been received or claimed. There was in the sentence which had been read a little ambiguity, (which would have been avoided by introducing the parenthesis before the five words which now preceded it,) but this error in style was no serious crime; and the meaning of a compact, which had been carried into effect without objection by either party, was best ascertained by its execution.

Among the errors of the bank, in its first operations, one of the greatest, as it appeared to him, had not been censured by the committee. He alluded to the attempt to pay the notes of the bank and its branches at any office at which they should be presented. The committee had said that "the relinquishment of this attempt was involuntary and reluctant;" but the attempt itself, though directed to the promotion of the public convenience, and urged by the public wish, had produced so much embarrassment and injury, that any exposition of the conduct of the bank must be very defective in which the effects of this injudicious scheme were omitted. He hoped not to be suspected of enlarging upon this subject for the purpose of supporting a favorite theory. Its examination was necessary, because it had produced much of the mischief which had been attributed to other causes. He should not have to argue that the bank was not bound to pay its notes indiscriminately at all its offices. He believed that nobody now contended that it was. He should not inquire how far it could be practicable so to pay them. His proposition was, that the attempt, while the situation of the country made it practicable, would even then be embarrassing and injurious.

In every system of bank circulation, the regulation of the amount of discounts and issues is a point of the utmost importance. In banks which redeem their paper by specie, the restraint upon excessive issues consists in this, that the superfluous paper is thrown back upon the bank and its specie withdrawn. The directors of a bank, with very little knowledge of the principles of circulation, and little information as to the currency of other States, are in this way controlled in all their operations, by a principle which proportions the circulating money of the country to its real business. He did not mean to inquire whether other or better regulations of the amount of paper in circulation might be adopted. We had no other. But how were the discounts of a branch bank restrained, under the system which provided that the notes which it issued should be redeemed at every office throughout the United States? If the balance of exchange was unfavorable, (and a profuse discount might at any time make it so,) it would be the interest of every man who got possession of a branch note to send it to a State where the exchange was high. A bank note is an order for the payment of money; and if the holder has the option of drawing this money at different places, he will draw it there where money is most valuable. If the discounts of Lexington were larger than the business of the place required, and the notes which were issued there were redeemable nowhere else, the bank at that place would immediately discover its error by the drafts upon its specie, and its discounts would be accordingly contracted. But if the notes of the Lexington branch are payable at New York, however profuse may be its discounts, the directors themselves discover, within the limits of their observation, no inconvenience from their liberality. They have lent only to those whose possessions are sufficient to secure the payment of their debts, the specie in their vaults remains untouched, and the income of the institution is increased by the large amount of their loans. In New York, indeed, if we suppose the exchange to be in favor of that place, the operation of the system is quite different. There, however prudent may be the bank in limiting the amount of its discounts, the increasing demands of the holders of Lexington paper exhaust its resources, and force a still further reduction of its discounts. Wherever the state of exchange is unfavorable, wherever the just principles of banking require a reduction of discounts, there, under this system of indiscriminate payment of its notes, the bank has nothing to fear from a draft of specie, and is encouraged to lend to every applicant. Wherever the state of exchange is favorable, and on the sound principles of banking an enlarged accommodation might be given to the community, there the flow of notes, from every State whose exchange is unfavorable, contracts or suspends all the operations of the bank. Thus, wherever discounts should be enlarged, the tendency of this system is to reduce them, and to enlarge them wherever they should be reduced.

It may indeed be said, that the directors of a branch bank, where the exchange is unfavorable, may contract their discounts, although no specie is drawn from them, because they well know that they might otherwise produce a pressure upon distant banks. This is to suppose that calculation of inconveniences to a distant branch will produce the same result which the sense of them, in their own bank, would produce. It may be said that the parent board, at least, will discover and correct the error, and that when the excessive issues of one branch have forced those of other States to redeem their notes, the controlling board will direct a transmission of specie from the debtor bank which will restore the balance. And all this the parent board will attempt to do. They will endeavor to remedy the irregularities which a better system would have avoided; they will direct, as the directors at Philadelphia have continually done, what the amount of discounts for their distant branches shall be—their orders will often be injudicious, and oftener ineffectual. It was no unfair account of the practical operation of the system of which he was speaking, to say, that it gave to the branches, where the exchange was unfavorable, the entire disposition of the specie of those branches where the exchange was favorable. Upwards of six millions of specie have been sent to the branch of New York, besides the amount which has been paid by the subscribers of the bank there; but, in issuing notes, which the bank of New York has been obliged to redeem, every branch throughout the country has drawn upon a fund, with whose condition, at the time, it could not be acquainted.

Such a system might be expected to produce inconvenient changes in the distribution of bank capital, an extreme facility in obtaining loans at one time, and unexpected contractions of discount at another. But it had been eighteen months in operation, and if his views were at all correct, the experience of the bank must exemplify and prove them.

The embarrassing effect of the system was developed in Boston, as early as March 17th, and in less than three months after, in New York; but he had not time to trace its history. An extract from the letter of the president of the Boston branch (March 19, 1818) to the president, Mr. Jones) would confirm some of the observations which he had made: "When the State banks were discounting here, though not largely, this bank called in, from its debtors, but thirty per cent. regularly; this placed them in a better state; by reducing their sums discounted, considerably, they acquired a balance against the other banks; but this only induced a call from the State banks on their debtors; the result is that, as they operate upon their whole system, they have a remedy. But this branch has the mass of paper thrown out at an opposite extreme to provide for, which it cannot, in any case, have the wished for information. On Monday last the bank made no discount to be mentioned, nor had they so done for many weeks previous. They had a balance of $93,000 against the other banks in town, and in specie about $23,000. Tuesday took from them about $30,000 and Wednesday about $50,000, and it followed that, as a great proportion of this is in Southern bills, produced by the scarcity of money here, this must produce a demand which the specie of the bank, and its balance against all the other banks in the town would not half discharge."

The effect of the system of paying the notes of the branches everywhere; in reducing discounts where the exchange is favorable, and enlarging them where it is adverse, is exemplified by a comparison between the discounts of New York, and those of Kentucky and Ohio. In November, 1818, the discounts in New York were $1,685,874; those in Kentucky, $3,221,450; and those in Ohio, $3,383,790; including, in the two last States, the debts which were due from banks which paid interest for them. Thus, the two agricultural States of Kentucky and Ohio have discounts from the National Bank to the amount of more than six millions and a half, or excluding stock notes from the calculation, about one-fourth of all the discounts made by the bank throughout the United States.

It could not be necessary to enlarge upon the objections to this unequal distribution of the capital of the National Bank. But a notion has prevailed, that, in respect to the Western States, the capital employed there has been only that which has been furnished by the deposits of the Government. He regretted that the directors of the National Bank, who had had it fully in their power to remove this prejudice, had hitherto neglected to do so. Mr. L. read many extracts from the report of a committee, lately made to the House of Representatives of the State of Ohio, in all of which, the assertion was made that the National Bank had carried no capital to the State, but had been supported principally, and almost entirely, by the deposits of the Government. Very different was the fact. He had on his table a calculation (deduced from statements contained among the documents which had been published) by which he endeavored to infer the amount of drafts and notes from the offices of Kentucky and Ohio, which had been paid in the Atlantic cities, beyond the amount which those offices had paid on Atlantic drafts.

This amount, he was confident, exceeded five millions and a half. He would be glad if any gentleman disposed to inquire into the subject would examine the paper. But no specie, it is said, was carried to Ohio and Kentucky. If the branches in those States had wagoned five and a half millions of dollars across the mountains, and then lent them to individuals, who had sent them out of the State for the purpose of merchandise, or the payment of debts, it would be admitted that a capital to that amount could have been transferred to the Western country. The bank did not do this. Instead of carrying the specie to Ohio and there lending it, the specie remained in the Atlantic States, and the citizens of Ohio obtained, not indeed silver in the first instance, but drafts and notes, which were sent to the Atlantic cities, and there drew out silver. If it had been proposed to the directors at Philadelphia, at the establishment of the bank, to employ this enormous capital in the Western States, they would not have consented that a fourth of it should be so engaged. But the unfortunate system which he had endeavored to explain had led gradually, and almost without observation, to a distribution of capital which otherwise could not have been granted, nor even asked. The directors of the western branches had not incurred the imputation of speculation or of collusion with speculators; the amount of stock pledged, and even owned there, was not large, and yet it was there that the amount of discounts was most excessive. The discounts of Kentucky and Ohio he had stated as amounting, in November, to more than six and a half millions; those of Baltimore, at the same time, were less than nine and a half millions, a much less amount than the other, comparing the business of the two. These western discounts were the greatest impediment to the successful administration of the bank. One of the most important duties which it behooved the directors to fulfil was that of making a better distribution of their capital. But many years must elapse before the discounts of the two States which he had mentioned could be reduced within their proper limits.

He had just received a copy of the memorial of delegates from the banks of Ohio to the Legislature of that State, and was glad to find that they began to understand the mischiefs which the indiscriminate payment of the National Bank notes was calculated to produce in the States whose exchange was unfavorable. [Mr. L. read a paragraph from the memorial which explains the injury which that practice occasioned, as it supposes, to the State of Ohio.] If the bank had refused payment of the notes of its branches, from the commencement of its operations, the memorialists insist that more of its paper would have circulated in the country. He hoped that the Committee would excuse him for having so long dwelt upon a topic hardly noticed in the report, but he had thought it important to show how large a part of the complaints against the banks resulted from a practice which must be considered as an error, not a fault, which had been entirely abandoned and which it was extremely improbable that any future board of directors would renew.

Mr. L. next adverted to that part of the report of the select committee which condemns the arrangements which were made for the payment of the dividends upon bank stock in England. The committee "do not undertake to decide how far it was objectionable to afford inducements to foreigners to become interested in our stock." "But, thus to compel American stockholders, and the Government, to contribute to the possible loss of paying the dividends to those abroad appears (they say) to be unjust." He thought that a very short inquiry would lead the Committee whom he addressed to a different conclusion.

The arrangement in question involved two considerations. Ought the National Bank to deal in exchange, and were the terms on which it sold bills to "the stockholder abroad" fair and advantageous? It was very plain, that, to make an arrangement with the foreign stockholder, by which it was stipulated to make the payment in England at par, six months after the dividend was declared, was substantially to sell at par bills payable six months after date. Ought then the bank to deal in exchange? It is the business for which the charter specifically provides; it is perhaps for the country one of the most useful operations, in which a National Bank can be engaged—its appropriate duty. It would do very well, the committee seem to think, if it were not for "the possible loss" in the transaction. And in exchange operations there is certainly some risk. In the case of the bank, the sale of bills implies the purchase of them, and bills may be protested. But the risk of the transaction was as good a reason against discounting notes as purchasing bills. He could not think, then, with the committee, "that it was unjust to oblige the American stockholder to contribute to the possible loss," while he was to share in the probable gain "of paying dividends to those abroad."

But were the terms unreasonable? If the bank deals in exchange, is the sale at par of its bills, where they are payable six months after date, or four months after sight, a sale for too low a price? Let an examination of the usual state of exchange decide the question. An examination of exchange, since the bank had gone into operation, might be objected to as furnishing no fair criterion of the prudence of the measure. Its state might have been accidentally favorable. But he held in his hand two statements of the annual gain and loss by exchange in the payment of our debt in Europe; by the one of which it appeared that the whole gain, after deducting occasional losses in remittances for the Dutch loans, from 1791 to 1809, inclusive, was upwards of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars; and by the other, that the gain, after the same deductions, under the operations of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, from 1802 to 1817, inclusive, was upwards of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The average price, then, which the Government had paid for its bills, in a period of twenty-six years, had been considerably below par. If the bank then had engaged to sell bills at par, it would have had reason, from the experience of twenty-six years, to think that the arrangement would be a prudent one; but, upon a fair estimate of the time which it gained, its price must be considered as being about one per cent. above par.

But the committee suppose "that the able reasons" assigned in the report of the committee (of the bank) against the measure "should have prevented its precipitate adoption." Mr. L. said that there were but two sentences in the report which referred at all to this subject. He read them, and asked whether the intimation that the existing unfavorable balance of trade alone influenced the "committee to decline the unqualified recommendation of such an agency" was considered as furnishing the "able reasons" in condemnation of the measure? In truth there was no reasoning in the report. But the authority of the committee was decidedly favorable to the general propriety of the measure which had been adopted.

Among the objections urged by the committee (of which he had had the honor to be a member) against the conduct of the bank, some of the most serious were those which regarded the amount and character of its discounts. He concurred with some of the views of the committee upon this subject. He did not now mean to speak of discounts given to enable the discounteer to pay his instalments upon stock. But, without reference to the object for which they were employed, the discounts, with a pledge of stock, were, many of them, as the committee had stated, "excessive in amount." While a pledge of stock is fairly employed as a mere substitute for personal security, he would not say that, even when valued at twenty-five per cent. advance, it might not be safe to the bank, as well as convenient to the merchant. As a mere substitute for personal security, it would imply that no discount would be made on it to an amount which would be refused to the same drawer with a common endorser. But many of the stock loans were so large that the pledge of stock lost its character of mere collateral security. When a loan for a million of dollars is secured by a pledge of stock, it was obvious that the stock was not considered only as a fund to supply any deficiency which the possible insolvency of the drawer might produce, but was the principal and almost the only foundation of the loan. The same loan would indeed be much more objectionable with the security only of an endorser.

There were expressions in the report which might be construed to imply a partiality in the distribution of these loans, which perhaps it was not designed to convey, and which, as it seemed to him, the evidence would not support. It was said that the loans "were not made"—he understood that the committee meant to say that most of them were not made—to the merchants and traders," but to a few persons, consisting of directors, brokers, and speculators. It was difficult for him—a stranger at Philadelphia—to pronounce sentence on the character of those who had borrowed money on a pledge of stock. Of the whole number, he knew personally but two or three, and neither of these were speculators or brokers. The committee had selected the names of fourteen, and had obtained evidence of their employments in life—seven were merchants, five were brokers, and two could not be classed in either list. Mr. McEuen's testimony, which has been published by the committee, contains his "opinion that a considerable proportion of discounts on pledged stock, was for the benefit of merchants, and not of speculators." Major Butler says, that "he has never known any good paper refused on account of the amount of stock notes offered."

It is said in the tenth page of the report that "not an instance has occurred of a note secured by the pledge of stock being rejected." If the merchant and trader then had not their share of the loans, it was only because they did not apply for them. The partiality in their distribution was not to individuals, professions, or parties: merchants, farmers, and artisans, obtained those discounts whenever they wished them. The partiality was to the whole body of holders of bank and funded stock throughout the United States. He believed there was not an instance of a note secured by a pledge of funded stock being rejected.

While his judgment led him to the conclusion that many of the stock loans were highly objectionable, from their amount, he thought it fair to add the view which had satisfied his mind, that a considerable proportion of those loans was necessary. He should have occasion, in another part of his remarks, to examine the state of exchange between the United States and other countries since the establishment of the National Bank, for the purpose of showing that the whole amount of its discounts was not excessive, although their distribution was unequal. But he wished now only to apply the test which the rate of exchange, as he thought, furnished, in an inquiry into the propriety of the discount operations of the bank in Philadelphia, in the months of July and August, 1817, when the amount of stock loans first became considerable. From the statement which he held in his hand, it appeared that the exchange with the principal countries of Europe continued, with very little variation, nearly at par during the time. This fact was incompatible with the supposition of an excessive circulation. The whole amount of notes, with a pledge of stock, discounted in Philadelphia in July and August, 1817, was about six millions and a half. The committee think it "singular" that at this time "any business paper should have been rejected." The whole amount rejected, was less than one million and a half. Supposing this sum to have been discounted, whether the parties were insolvent or not, and the stock notes rejected, the amount of discounts in Philadelphia, in two months, would have been less by five millions than it actually was. Of these five millions, a part (he did not know what part) was employed for the payment of subscriptions to the bank, and did not add to the amount of money in circulation. Suppose half to have been so employed, and a reduction of two and a half millions in the circulation of Philadelphia, below the amount which kept its exchange at par, would have suspended mercantile business, and spread embarrassment and distress through every town in the State. He appealed to gentlemen whose business or curiosity had led them to observe the effects—which even an inconsiderable change in the quantity of money produces in a commercial community, to say whether there was anything visionary or extravagant in this view.

It had been alleged as an excuse for the magnitude and permanence of the loans which were made about this time by the bank, that the redemption of its stock by the Government had made it necessary that it should invest the State bank paper, which it was paid in, in some other securities. He must, however, observe, that the embarrassment of the bank, from the accumulation of the paper of State banks in some parts of the Union, did not originate in the measure to which it had been exclusively attributed. Its own errors were a principal cause. As early as March, 1817, it suffered, from a deficiency of resources, at Boston; and three months afterwards, in New York; while a large amount of balances against the banks to the South and West of those places had accumulated, even at that early period of its operations.

The observations of the report on the subject of post notes, Mr. L. thought liable to misconception. After referring to several transactions in which post notes were received by those who had obtained discounts, it is observed, "that not being drafts on other offices, they cannot be considered as exchange operations." Now, every post note but one, to which reference was made in the report, was "a draft upon another office." The resolution under which they were given, would be found among the documents, (page 92.) They were post notes of the bank at Philadelphia. They were obtained by those who got discounts at Baltimore. This appeared to him, therefore, to be a simple case of exchange.

The case of the post notes mentioned in the first part of the paragraph, was different. The post note was payable in the same place in which the discounted note was payable. There was, too, some ambiguity in the resolution for granting the discount, and it might possibly be inferred, if we had no other evidence, that it was a condition of the loan, that a post note, payable sixty days after date, should be received by the discounteer. But had we no other evidence? Mr. Smith swears (documents, p. 114) that "post notes at sixty days date, have frequently been issued on the application of persons who have had notes discounted, but it has never been the condition of the discount." To every man who knows what post notes are, their convenience to mercantile men, and indeed to society generally, can require no explanation. A post note of the Philadelphia bank is better than a bill of exchange upon Philadelphia. If the exchange with New Orleans is in favor of Philadelphia, a merchant who wishes to make purchases at Orleans will find a post note of Philadelphia, or a power to draw upon it, among the best means of accomplishing his object. Bank notes, indeed, might answer the same purpose; but, as they are payable to bearer, the risk in their transmission is greater. In the instance referred to in the report, the bank had no possible interest in preferring the issue of post notes to bank notes, because the distance of the place to which the notes were to be sent, was an effectual security that bank notes would not have returned upon it within sixty days.

Mr. L. said that he had detained the Committee very long on topics which he did not consider likely to affect the decision of any of the resolutions. But he had feared that, if the opinions of the select committee, on some of these points, had passed without objection, they would be considered as having received the sanction of the House.

He came now to the question which he supposed should chiefly engage the attention of the Committee: How far has the bank answered the great object of its institution? If, as a measure of policy, the dissolution of the charter would be unwise, Congress would not dissolve it, even though such a penalty were just, and such a proceeding legal.

The great object of Government in chartering the bank, was to provide a currency which should have that degree of stability and uniformity in its value, which is required by the interests both of our commerce and revenue. A currency equally valuable at every place and every time, cannot be provided by human wisdom. The nearest approach to this object has been generally supposed to be afforded by the employment of gold and silver as the measures of value. The 14th Congress did not aim at ideal perfection; they wished to combine with the conveniences of bank circulation an uniformity of value equal to that which was possessed by the precious metals; and the means which they employed to secure this uniformity were simple and effectual, by enjoining, under a heavy penalty, the payment of all its notes in coin, upon demand. In the report, indeed, the notes of the National Bank are said to be now "on the same footing with those of local banks." Of the footing on which local bank notes stood, he should speak hereafter; but the price current upon his table informed him that the greatest discount on branch notes of the United States, was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent. This was a value much more uniform than that which coin could be expected to have in so extensive a country. He had been lately looking into a book on political economy, which had been published here with high, and, in respect to its clearness and precision, with just commendations—the work of Mr. Tracy. He inferred from one of his chapters, that the difference of exchange between Marseilles and Paris, was often from 2 to 3 per cent. If, with all the facilities afforded by the internal improvements in which France is so rich—with a currency consisting almost exclusively of gold and silver, the variation in the value of money is three times greater in her territory than on our continent, can it be said that, in this respect, the bank has not fulfilled the objects of its institution? Before its establishment, the value of bank notes, even in the commercial States, had varied 20 per cent. from each other, and, as none of them bore a fixed proportion to the precious metals, or to any natural standard, it was impossible to assign any limit to their depreciation. You have required that the currency furnished by the National Bank should be everywhere convertible into silver, and it is so. You have expected that it should be as uniform as coin, and it is more so. He would not detain the Committee by reading a paper which he had prepared with that intention, containing the state of exchange, since the establishment of the bank, with England, France, and Holland; for he found himself occupying much more of their time than he had expected. But he believed that any member who should turn his attention to the subject, would remark its steadiness during that period. He thought himself justified in drawing from this fact a conclusion highly favorable to the bank—that the whole amount of its discounts had generally been nearly right. The distribution of those discounts he had admitted to be wrong. It was the total amount of discounts which a spirit of eager and intemperate speculation would be most apt to enlarge. It was the total amount of discounts which a just regard to the stability of our money made it most important to restrain.

The correspondence of the bank with the western branches had been adverted to in the report of the committee. Mr. L. thought that it illustrated the general views which he had submitted of the subject. He read the 5th and 6th rules prescribed for the government of a western office, (documents, p. 29,) to show that the orders of the parent board were sufficiently energetic. The method of securing their execution by orders directly issued to their cashier, showed no want of decision. But the system which encouraged the board to extend its discounts by paying its bills in the Atlantic cities, and then aimed at reducing them by orders from the mother bank, was radically wrong.

To do justice to the conduct of the bank, and fairly to estimate its services in maintaining specie payments, it was proper to consider the peculiar difficulties of the time. He would not enter into the inquiry how far the payment of a large public debt must add, in every country, to the difficulties of banks of circulation; but, confining himself to the payment of about five millions of the Louisiana debt in one year, he would ask whether a remittance of this amount to foreign creditors must not press heavily upon the resources of a National Bank? Its arrangements, indeed, had been such as to relieve the country from much of the embarrassment which might have been anticipated—such as to illustrate very strikingly the advantage which a National Bank may produce in the management of exchanges. By becoming the agent for the remittance of the principal part of the debt, it has been able to conduct, without much inconvenience, an operation which might otherwise have produced a pressure upon the whole banking interest of the country. Among the difficulties of maintaining specie payments, the extraordinary extension of our trade to the East Indies could not be overlooked; and the demand for the precious metals in Europe, which resulted from the attempt by so many nations which, during their late wars, had used only paper, to recover specie circulation, was felt on this side of the Atlantic. Among the effects of paper money, that of its making the value of the metals more variable, even in countries which do not use it, must be obvious to the Committee. The employment of paper in any country causes its specie to be exported, and, adding to the supply of that article in foreign States, reduces its value there. The restoration of specie currency, by opening a new demand for the article from other countries, enhances its value there. Such is the process which is now going on in many parts of Europe. The diminution in the supply from the South American mines will be considered as exerting a less questionable influence on our stock of the precious metals. It was in opposition to all these difficulties—in defiance of the discontent which contracted discounts must have been expected to produce among its debtors, and a reduced dividend among its stockholders, that the Bank of the United States performed its great duty—that of maintaining specie payments throughout the whole extent of this country.

The safekeeping of the public deposits, which implies their prompt payment in specie upon demand, must appear particularly important to a Government whose losses have hitherto been so heavy as ours from the want of this provision. Even now, after the immense amount of paper which had been assumed by the National Bank, there remained, he believed, more than $500,000 of bank paper belonging to the Government, of which it had lost the use from the war to this time; of some of which he was very certain that it would lose even the principal.

The bank is admitted to have fulfilled the duty of transmitting the public money, without charge, wherever it might be required. He believed that the answer to the resolution of his friend from Virginia (directing an account of the money so transmitted) had not been received, and he was sure that, when received, it must be imperfect and unsatisfactory. The account must represent each office as receiving the amount lodged there, whether in its own bills or any other; and, in practice, a large proportion of the bills which are paid where exchange is most favorable, will be those of the States whose exchange is most unfavorable. For example, a large proportion of the revenue accruing in Boston will be paid in the notes of Ohio. That the transmission of money on account of the Government must be very considerable, even in time of peace, must be true, unless the expenditure of the country in each little district be supposed to be nearly equal to the revenue collected there. But the revenue and expenditure may be exactly equal—let us suppose that to be the case in Boston—and yet the bank may have to transmit for the Government the whole amount of such expenditure—that is, it may receive, upon the supposition which has been made, the money of Ohio, and pay to the Government Boston money. But, although the advantage was very considerable in peace, it was, by considering its effect in war, only that we could estimate its real magnitude.

If the direct duties which the bank owes to the Government have been fulfilled, he would inquire how far the institution had furnished those accommodations to public debtors, which had probably been expected from it? These accommodations were of two kinds—by its loans, and by the general circulation of its paper.

There are two sentences in the report, which seem to intimate that the loans to public debtors, by the Bank of the United States, have been inadequate to their just expectations. The report represents the Northern offices as compelled "to deny to the debtors of the Government any indulgence or accommodation in their payments;" and in another page it states that "it does not appear that the notes of those who had revenue bonds to pay have at any time been discounted extensively." He considered this quite as a minor subject of attention; but he would state the evidence as it had appeared to his investigation.

In the very commencement of the operation of the bank, (on the 3d of January, 1817,) the board resolved that notes for those who had revenue bonds to pay should be discounted, and might be paid in the paper of other banks, while of the small amount of the notes discounted the whole were to be paid exclusively in specie. On the 9th of January a resolution authorized the offices to discount notes for revenue bonds, at a time when they had not commenced any other business. On the 4th April, 1817, when the board was obliged to limit its discounts everywhere, it directed a preference to be given to custom-house bonds. Thus we had proof that in the first business of the bank, a preference had been given to the notes of Government debtors, that the preference continued when circumstances required a general limitation of discounts; and if this was the case when the bank was straitened, it would be extraordinary indeed that it should be less liberal at other times. Nor did he know anything to countenance the opinion that it was so.

Perhaps we might infer something as to the disposition of the bank to extend its accommodations to the public from the order in which its first loans had been made. It was then that it must have been most penurious and reluctant in its discounts. Its first loan made before January, 1817, was one of $500,000 to the Government. In Philadelphia it loaned in January, 1817, $182,642 to stockholders, and its next loans were $293,502 to those who were indebted on custom-house bonds. Indeed he remembered no evidence of a discount being at any time refused on the notes of custom house debtors. And Major Butler's testimony, of which he had already spoken, had not been impugned by that of any other witness. The Committee would recollect the statement, "that he had never known any good paper refused on account of the amount of stock notes offered."

The Committee probably remembered a sentence in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which he would read before he dismissed the subject. "The bank has promptly transmitted the public money wherever and whenever it has been required to perform that service. It is presumed that the facilities expected from it in the collection of duties have been furnished, as no information has been received at this Department, stating that such facilities have been withheld."

Such was the evidence "as to the indulgence or accommodation to the debtors of the Government" by the bank, or such it appeared to him to be, of evidence which might lead to a different conclusion, he knew none.

But the more important accommodation to public debtors, which was expected from the National Bank, consisted certainly rather in its supplying a currency which the Government engaged everywhere to receive, than in loans to which, under common circumstances, the State banks were quite adequate. How had this duty of supplying a national currency been performed? Of the inequality in the value of the National Bank notes, he had already spoken, and he hoped that he had satisfied the Committee that it had been less than had been expected at its institution. He had not heard the entire amount of notes thrown into circulation represented as deficient. Their distribution he had admitted to be bad, and had endeavored to explain the principal cause of its being so. But the loudest complaints against the bank on account of deficiency of its notes were from the States in which the most disproportionate and excessive issues had been made. He read a paragraph from the report of a committee of the House of Representatives of Ohio, in which they characterize the proceedings of the bank in requiring that payments should be made in its own notes, as little better "than insulting mockery." It might seem that, wherever bank notes which the Government engaged to receive in taxes might be issued, they would be carried to any part of the country in which they were necessary for the payment of public debts. The foreign merchandise, which is landed in New York or New Orleans, is conveyed wherever there is a demand for it. And the credit or produce which enabled any section of the country to obtain foreign merchandise would be quite as effectual to procure bank notes or specie. But it was not necessary that Ohio, which perhaps complained most of the want of National Bank notes in its circulation, should have imported them from other States. In Kentucky and Ohio individuals had discounts to an amount exceeding five millions of dollars; they had received this amount in bank notes or in credits equivalent to notes, and for which notes might have been obtained; but they had them no longer. The complaint, then, was this: not that the bank had not furnished a sufficient circulating medium to Kentucky and Ohio, but that it had not retained it there. Could the bank have prevented its remittance to other States? The States to which its discounts had been largest, had chosen to employ them in the payment of former debts or the purchase of merchandise. He believed that there was a fund of justice in the people of this country, which would not allow them to consider the bank as responsible for the mischiefs which an improvident use of its discounts may have produced.

Of other advantages furnished to the Government by the bank, he would not speak; some of them were great, and he supposed undisputed. Of these, the bonus of a million and a half, was not the most considerable, and yet the representatives of the people might be expected to hesitate before they threw away even a million and a half. The obligation to transact all the business of the Loan office without charge, and the facilities which the bank must afford in all future loans, he considered as yet greater advantages.

We have seen how far the great duties of the bank have been fulfilled, and its expected advantages realized. But every question like that before the Committee, so far as it was a question of policy, not of justice or law, was in a great measure a comparative one. We had seen and knew what was the condition of the currency, and what the security for the operations of the Treasury with the Bank of the United States. What would be its condition without the bank, was a fair subject of inquiry and comparison; and a prudent man would consider even the doubt which must prevail as to the currency which would be established, as in itself a very strong objection to the destruction of the bank. What would our currency be? Would it be exclusively specie? Would it be State bank notes or Government paper?

He did not think (although perhaps the highest authority on matters of this kind was in favor of the opinion) that the employment of paper rather than coin, was sufficiently recommended by its economy, as the substitution of a cheap instrument of trade for an expensive one. If there were no other inducement for the use of paper, it would resemble the economy which should substitute wooden warehouses for stone ones. Without entering into an inquiry into the advantages or defects of a specie circulation, he would confess that his apprehensions would be much less than they were, if he could suppose that the metals would form the only currency of the country; that the Government could and would exact gold and silver in the payment of all its debts. But he would not waste the time of the Committee in speaking of an expectation, which every man who heard him, believed to be visionary.

In destroying the Bank of the United States, then, we must do it, because we prefer the currency which will be afforded either by the notes of local banks or by Government paper. It was not fair, indeed, to address this argument to gentlemen who believed that they were bound by the Constitution to destroy this institution. His friend from Virginia had properly abstained from the discussion of the Constitutional question, although he seemed to expect it from the opposers of the resolution. Mr. L. would follow in this instance his example, not his advice.

What were the inducements to prefer, in the receipt of taxes, the notes of local banks? A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PINDALL) had supposed that without a National Bank, the State institutions, in their own time and manner, would all have returned to specie payments; that the Legislature of every separate State would at some time or another have made them do so. Mr. L. had no faith in this security, and he was sure that it would be vain to inquire for evidence of it. What they would have done under circumstances of great difficulty he would not say; but he would show what one of them was doing or was likely to do now. He meant again to refer to the report of a committee of the House of Representatives of Ohio; he did so with all proper deference, and without objection or complaint. Nothing was more fair than that the State of Ohio should receive in payment of its taxes and debts whatever money it preferred; but when it was argued that the United States might safely trust the regulation of their currency (the framers of the Constitution, by the by, had not thought so) to the regulation of the State Legislatures, it became necessary to inquire what was the currency with which those Legislatures would be satisfied. The report to which he had alluded, noticed, without disapprobation, the suspension of specie payments by the banks of the State; reprobated the conduct of the National Bank in refusing to receive their bills in payments; and declared that they formed "a solid currency" "for all the purposes of internal commerce." No proposal could be expected, and he believed none was made for a change in the solid currency which was so satisfactory to the State. But, did the interests or duty of the Government of the United States permit that this currency should be received by it? Some dissatisfaction was expressed, because the branch notes of the United States Bank were at a discount of three-quarters of one per cent. He read from a price current the state of the market for bank notes; by which it appeared that notes which were insisted to be in very good credit, varied from a discount of 2½, to one of 7, 15, 25, and even 30 per cent. Was our revenue to be received in these notes? How were they to be employed? They might be expended in the district in which they were issued. But was the expenditure of every district to be exactly limited to its revenue? What became of the Union if it were so? He spoke of the thing, and not of the name. Our Union might dissolve in imbecility, as well as be destroyed by violence. Did not Union imply, that the resources of one State, its money as well as its men, might be employed for the defence of another? To authorize the General Government to levy a revenue from every part of the country, and to expend it only where it was levied, would be as wise a provision as that of empowering the President to call out the militia, with a condition that each man should fight only upon his own farm. The Committee were aware that the money which the Government received in the Western States, was principally the produce of its sales of public land. It was the fund which had been assigned to the Government, and pledged for the payment of the public debt. This debt was due almost exclusively in the Atlantic States and in Europe. Our creditors would not certainly receive Western paper. To say that it should be received by the Government, was to say that the fund should be diverted from the great object for which it had been established. But, if the Government were willing to bear the loss of a depreciated and unequal currency, it must neglect the plainest principle of the Constitution in doing so—equality of taxation. The Committee must well remember that, before the establishment of the National Bank, such was the unequal value of money in the different States, that the merchants paid duties varying fifteen per cent. from each other, on the same articles. The merchant on one side of the Chesapeake bay, was forced either to submit to heavy loss or to enter his goods on the other side, where he did not expect them to be consumed. Thus was a constant encouragement held out to depreciation by the Government itself. The worse the paper in which the Government debt was paid, the stronger the temptation to the business of importation in the place in which the duties were thus reduced.

Was the issue of Government paper a measure to which we ought willingly to resort? Mr. L. would not indiscriminately reprobate all issues of this kind. Other nations, as well as our own, had resorted to them, and the emergency had justified the act. He might acquiesce in paper money from necessity; he would not adopt it from choice. That the destruction of the bank would be followed by the establishment of paper money, he firmly believed—he might almost say he knew. It was an extremity from which the House would recoil, if it were now proposed; but if the resolution upon the table were passed, it would very soon be proposed. The subject was too large for an incidental discussion. Gentlemen thought that the amount of Government paper might be limited, and depreciation prevented by the rate of interest which should be exacted. Inadequate everywhere, the security was particularly ineffectual in the United States. Both the natural and legal rate of interest were different in the different States. The State in which the actual rate of interest was highest, would borrow the largest amount of Government paper, in proportion to its business. From it, this paper must flow upon the other States, and, adding to their quantity of an article for which there was no foreign use, its depreciation must be infallible. He had not time further to develop the argument, but he trusted it to the reflections of every man who would turn his attention to the subject.

Mr. L. would dismiss this topic with one more remark. The inequalities and inconveniences of bank paper would not be removed by Government paper. The local banks would discount on specie; and the proportion between the Government paper and the bank notes which would be considered as representing it, might be as unequal as it now is between those notes and specie.

Such were some of the permanent evils which the destruction of the bank might be expected to produce. Upon temporary evils and individual losses, although he could not look upon them with indifference, he would not enlarge. Let not gentlemen delude themselves with the hope that if the institution were destroyed, its affairs would be gradually wound up; that the convenience of the debtor, and not the interest of the stockholder, would determine the extent of the indulgence that should be granted to him. In the scarcity of money which would follow the destruction of the bank, property might be expected to fall 15 or 20 per cent.; or in other words, money to rise in the same proportion. In whatever proportion the capitalist who was turned out of the National Bank should choose to invest his money, to consent to a delay in its collection and investment, would be to add a new and certain loss to those with which he had been before afflicted. Indulgence would be given where it was necessary to secure the debt, not where it was necessary to save the debtor.

He confessed that he did not understand the views of those who were anxious that the branches of the United States Bank should be immediately withdrawn from Kentucky and Ohio. Was it meant that they should not continue to lend? If these States owed five or six millions to the bank, there was but one mode by which their justice would allow them to wish that such loans should be discontinued—by their payment. But when could five millions be paid by them? He would answer for it, that the directors would be willing to reduce their discounts, and withdraw their funds from the Western States, much more quickly than it would be possible for their debtors to enable them to adopt that process.

Mr. L. said that he deceived himself, if he had not proved that the great objects proposed in the establishment of the National Bank had been fulfilled. But if he were wrong, if it had disappointed the just expectations of the country, an enlightened legislature would inquire whether there were no remedy short of its destruction. The charter had given to the Government powerful means for restraining the errors and controlling the conduct of the bank. The appointment of five directors, the withholding public deposits, the refusal to receive its notes in payment of taxes, an examination into the whole conduct and real condition of the institution—these gave us a command which, while it was fairly and moderately employed, could not be disregarded or resisted. Would it be wise to destroy a constitution because you disapproved of its first administration? Would you even break up a machine, because in its first experiment there had been some mismanagement? On this part of the subject, he had the rare advantage of supporting his opinions by those of the select committee. The committee say, that "to correct the many evils and mischiefs they have depicted," "the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy whenever the situation of the bank shall require it." They had before observed, that "the root and source of all the instances of misconduct was the illegal, reprehensible division of the stock." "In the opinion of the committee, it is the greatest evil in all the system, and is the origin of all the others." "It requires a corrective." And the committee have proposed a bill which they consider as adequate to its correction. Can it be, when "the greatest evil and the origin of all the others," is one which it is not only so practicable but so easy to correct, that we shall destroy where we might cure?

He should say but a few words as to the present condition of the bank, and the character and safety of its debts. The views which could be taken of such a subject, must certainly be very general ones. He did not mean to speak of the safety of the holders of bank notes. That would be perfect, if half the debts of the institution were bad. But he did not believe that any of the errors imputed to the bank had impaired or endangered its capital. The notes secured by a pledge of stock had been most objected to. So far as the stock was pledged at par, it was evident that the security was perfect—if not in all cases for prompt, yet in all for the eventual payment of the notes. For information on the subject of those notes and their security, he referred to table 42, among the documents which had been published.

The whole value of the stock, as the security, estimated at par, exceeded the whole amount of the loans which it was pledged to secure by upwards of $1,898,000. But there were particular loans which exceeded the value of the stock pledged to secure them (if that stock were estimated at par) by $450,273. This, then, was the whole amount of stock loans which exposed the capital of the bank to any hazard. (The stockholder who owed the par value of his stock was equally debtor and creditor of the institution—the opposite quantities neutralized each other.) It was to these $450,000, that the inquiry applied; was the personal security given for that amount sufficient? The report stated "that the provision requiring an endorser for the excess above the par value, was in many instances effectually evaded by some of the largest borrowers becoming endorsers for each other." How far the endorsers were responsible men, he did not know. This mutual endorsement was one of the evils which the practice of lending upon stock tended to remove. But when it was considered that the whole amount of stock loans, for the safety of which personal security could be at all necessary, was in Philadelphia $173,450, and in Baltimore $276,823, it must be admitted that there might be a very free exchange of names in those cities, and these inconsiderable amounts be yet effectually secured. He thought it not unlikely that the committee had fallen into the error of comparing the personal security not with the moderate sum to which it was applicable, (the excess of the loan above the par value of the stock,) but with the large sum, for which there was another and an adequate security, (that of the stock.)

If the loans on stock were considered safe, the only class of debts which the committee, from any information before them, had reason to suppose exposed to risk, (and they had that reason only from their magnitude,) was that of the debts due in the Western States. He had admitted that some years must pass before the greater part of these could be paid. But, although the circumstances of those States made it likely that they could not be promptly paid, he saw no reason to believe that they might not be paid eventually. In the meantime, they might be considered as diminishing the active capital of the bank. It is, however, by no means true, (where the condition of the country or the charter of a bank prevents it from owning funded stock,) that long loans to individuals may not properly be made—but he was afraid to engage in this digression.

He had as yet said nothing as to the violation of the charter. It was, indeed, in his view of the matter, a subject of no great importance to determine whether a legal and technical violation had been committed. If the public interest required that the institution should be preserved, the Legislature would preserve for the same reasons for which they had established it. The question of law would be much better discussed by those who were acquainted with its intricacies, and he had detained the Committee so long upon the other branches of the argument, that he would comment very briefly upon this. He differed, he believed, upon this subject, from all the members of the committee. He thought that none of the acts alleged amounted to a violation of the charter.

The first violation of the charter, as alleged in the report, was that of purchasing two millions of public debt. The bank, when engaged in importing specie from Europe, had sold two millions of its funded stock in England. This stock, in the hands of the bank, was redeemable at the pleasure of the Government. Before it had been subscribed to the bank, it had been, by the condition of the loan, irredeemable until the year 1825. The bank supposed that it was restored to this irredeemable character when it again became private property. He confessed that he thought so; and he believed it to be a common, and even the general opinion. The Secretary of the Treasury thought otherwise, and insisted upon the right to redeem the stock which had been sold in England. The loss which the purchasers would in this way have sustained would have impeached the credit of the bank. To maintain it, the Secretary of the Treasury proposed that the bank should purchase, on account of the Government, the same amount of stock which it had sold; and it did so.

The charter provides that the bank shall not purchase any public stock. The merest verbal construction of the sentence—the interpretation to be obtained from a dictionary—would be, that that the bank should not "acquire by buying," it should not become the owner, by purchase, of the public stock. And it did not. There was not a moment during which the bank was the owner of the stock, which was at once transferred from the individuals who sold it to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. But he would willingly waive the verbal question. What was the intention of the provision? That the bank should not become the owner of funded stock, so as to enhance the price when the Government wanted to buy, or to reduce it when it wanted to borrow. And how could either of these evils result from its buying at the instance of the Government, and for the benefit of the Government, any amount of stock whatever? But it did not act, the report says, as an agent in the purchase of the stock, because it contributed out of its own funds a part of the price. The committee appeared to him to have confounded two acts which were very distinct. The bank, if the Secretary was right, was clearly bound to pay the difference between the par value of stock and its actual price to those to whom they had sold it as irredeemable, but in whose hands the Secretary determined to redeem it. It was as well to pay it to the Government. Suppose it to have done so, (and it substantially did,) where was the law which forbade it, although it had contributed a part of the funds, to act in its usual and convenient character of the agent of the Government.

If the purchase in question be one which is prohibited by the charter, the directors who sanctioned it are liable by law to a very heavy fine. Would any member propose that they should be prosecuted for this act of defence and benefaction to the Government? Could it be that this purchase was not such a "dealing in stock" as could subject the individuals who made it to personal responsibility, and yet, that it should subject the institution itself to the penalty of dissolution?

The second alleged violation of charter consisted in not requiring the payment of the second or third instalments in coin and funded debt. What are the powers of the directors as to the debts due to the institution generally? They may change the security, they may prolong their credit, they may vary both the time and place of payment. Mr. L. did not see, when the bank was once in operation, that the power of the directors, in respect to instalments, was not precisely the same as in every other debt. The committee say that the bank should have insisted upon

H. or R.

"the specific thing." When a bank is once in operation, it must consider its own notes as specie; and, under the compact with the State banks, the National Bank was, in fact, obliged to consider their notes as specie. The question, indeed, resolves itself into two: 1. Ought notes of the National or State banks to have been admitted in payment of the instalments? 2. Ought any discounts to have been made to subscribers to the bank?

Can it be seriously contended that the bank ought not to have received its own notes as specie? You appear at the counter with $1,000 in its paper. It refuses to receive it, and insists that you should go through the process of causing the specie to be brought from its vaults, paid to you by the teller, and then to the teller by you, and everything would be formal and right. The silver might then be restored to its former place. So even with the State bank notes. The National Bank, it is said, ought not to have received them. You must then have drawn specie out of the State bank, paid it into the National Bank—the National Bank, under its compact, must have lent it immediately to the State bank from which it had been drawn; and, after the whole manœuvre was over, the specie must have resumed the position which it had left in the morning. There was but one possible mode by which the payment of the instalment "in the specific thing" could have been secured, (if it could have been at all secured,) by delaying the commencement of operations until they were paid. The attempt would have been very injurious to the country, it was incompatible with the proposals of the Government, and was interdicted by the law. He had enlarged enough upon this subject in the commencement of his observations. The large amount of notes which the bank threw into circulation, if not a single note had been discounted for a subscriber, would have had the effect of causing the instalments to be paid in notes, not in coin. They would be paid in whichever of these articles could be most easily obtained, and if the issue of it was large, the article most easily obtained must be paper.

It was hardly important, then, if they discounted at all, whether they discounted to subscribers or not. But why should they not? The very business for which the directors were appointed was to lend money. If a subscriber paid one moment, the directors might properly lend to him the next. If specie were drawn from a State bank in one hour, they would properly lend it to the bank the hour after. Did not this imply that they might prolong the credit of the subscriber, and receive the note of the bank?

The observations which he had made applied to the discounts for instalments generally. There were peculiar reasons in favor of those which were made between the 3d and 23d of January, 1817, under the resolution of December 18, which made the conduct of the bank in relation to them not only allowable, but wise. He had neither strength nor time to enter into the inquiry, but he had on his table the names of all the discounters; and an examination would show that they were not, in general, large stockholders, and that the great proportion of their notes was paid at maturity.

But the report says that the directors abandoned the means of coercion given by the charter, and gained nothing. It was true that, in discounting a note for a subscriber, to enable him to pay his instalment, they gave up the means of coercion which the withholding the dividends might furnish. But did they gain nothing? Was it not notorious that, under the common construction of the charter, it was considered fair, and not discreditable, to postpone payment of the instalment and abandon the dividend? No man's credit has been hurt by this delay in paying the instalment. The first gain of the bank, then, was that of pledging the personal credit of the subscriber to his punctuality. The second advantage which the bank gained, it might have been expected, could not have been overlooked or disputed—the actual payment of one-fourth part of each share in funded stock. The third advantage was the pledge of stock, with the power immediately to sell it upon the failure of the subscriber to pay his note. He would venture to say that there was not one of these notes, the payment of which, at maturity, might not have been enforced by this provision. The statement given by the committee of the price of stocks during the year 1817, would establish this proposition.

He must here suggest the argument which had been anticipated by the gentleman from Virginia. In January, 1817, if the transaction of which he was speaking was wrong and mischievous, Congress knew it—knew it in time to prevent it. A committee was instructed to inquire into the subject. This committee reported that there was no occasion for the interposition of Congress, and Congress did not interfere. A friend of his from Georgia, proposed a resolution that the public deposits should be withheld, while the plan which the committee disapproved was persevered in. The resolution was adequate to its object. The House did not take it up. Since that time how many purchasers have become interested in the stock, who have never suspected that Congress would punish vindictively an act which it would not interpose to prevent!

The third instance of violation of charter, is said to consist in the payments of dividends to delinquent stockholders. These dividends were paid when their subscriptions were received, and they ceased to be delinquent. If he understood the documents, the whole amount of dividends so paid, of which he had any evidence, was $1,460; but from this the interest which they paid must be deducted, and they possibly received $360 more than they were entitled to. The precise amount, indeed, is not important. And by whom were these dividends paid? Did the directors order—did they know it? He really did not think that the payment of three or four hundred dollars, however erroneously, by a subordinate officer, could be justly punished by the loss of the charter of the bank, or, to take the test proposed by the committee, "that it defeated the very objects of its institution."

The fourth alleged violation consisted in allowing bad votes to be given at elections. Without reference to the number of these votes, or to their effect upon the election, he was willing to leave the charge, without argument, to the Committee.

He had attempted to show that the dissolution of the bank charter, as a measure of policy, was not wise—as a penalty, that it was not legal. But what is just? You allege that the institution has been mismanaged. You admit that the stockholders have been the principal sufferers, and, in resentment of their wrongs, you ruin them. You censure the conduct of a direction of which you appointed the most active members and the head, and you mulct, perhaps to the ruin of their fortunes, the men whose error consists in supporting your appointments, and confiding in your superintendence.

On the whole, he should vote against all the resolutions before the Committee. His friend from Virginia had said that a Legislature may repeal any of its acts. Can a Legislature make a contract? To assume the power of annulling contracts, is to lose the privilege of making them.

The proposal for issuing a scire facias had certainly the recommendation of being within the Constitutional powers of Congress. He had endeavored to show that it had no other.

Mr. L. said he was too much fatigued to discuss the resolutions proposed by the chairman of the select committee. He was, however, glad that he had withdrawn the most objectionable. Of those which remained, some might do a little good, and some a little harm; some appeared to him to be absolutely nugatory, and nearly all of them unimportant. He could not understand how the maintenance of a great institution, powerful as all men allowed it to be, for good or mischief, should be made to depend upon such conditions.

Mr. TYLER said, that he was aware of the embarrassments under which he rose to address the Committee. The late hour of the day would be enough, in itself, to advise him of its exhausted patience. But a regard to the economy of time, a recollection that but few days remained for legislation, induced him to proceed. From the moment that the Speaker thought proper to confer on me the honor of an appointment on the committee whose report is now under consideration, up to this time, I have felt the responsibility of my situation. It is known to you, Mr. Chairman, that I represent a district deeply interested in the decision of the questions now depending. It is known to this Committee, that it became my duty to present a petition, signed by many of my most respectable constituents, the other day, to the House, adverse to the course which I shall pursue. I can, however, sir, neither look to the right nor the left—my own personal popularity can have no influence over me, when the dictates of my best judgment, and the obligations of an oath, require of me a particular course. Under such circumstances, whether I sink or swim on the tide of popular favor, is to me a matter of inferior consideration. It is my misfortune, also, to follow, in this debate, the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDSE,) whose views are, in the general, most luminous and correct. Upon this question, however, I am forced to differ from him. Sir, the gentleman has dwelt upon the benefits arising from the bank. He has presented you, alone, the fair side of the picture. In many of his views I concur with him, but it becomes us to examine both sides of the painting. He has represented this institution as vitally connected with the prosperity of the country. Its destruction is to be attended with the most fatal consequences. And are we come to this? Shall we be forced to countenance speculation and fraud from the fear of encountering the evils of putting down this system? Is it so completely interwoven with our best interests as to endanger those interests by putting it down? Does this Government, indeed, rest on this corporation for stability and support? I cannot believe it. We are not yet reduced to such a state of degradation. Sir, if the gentleman from South Carolina had exerted his talents for the purpose of devising a scheme by which we could have successfully extricated ourselves from our present embarrassing situation, I cannot, but think, with all respect to that gentleman, but that he would much more beneficially have employed those talents than by the course he has thought proper to pursue. If the evils of this system, as disclosed in the report and testimony, be not sufficient to induce us to direct a scire facias, in the name of Heaven, I demand to know what would be considered a sufficient inducement?

Sir, in many of the views which the gentleman has taken, I concur with him entirely. That the bank has acted correctly, in some instances, no one can doubt. That the effects of some of its measures have been beneficial, I am willing to admit. It has facilitated the operations of the Treasury; it may have gone far to introduce an uniform currency among us. I am not disposed to canvass these propositions. But, sir, the gentleman has alluded to some expressions, in the report of the committee, which, I think, are susceptible of defence. I allude to the remarks he has made on the subject of the establishment of an agency in England to pay over the dividends to foreign stockholders. The report barely glances at the propriety or impropriety of the bank undertaking to deal in bills of exchange. It was a question which the committee did not feel a disposition to decide. But the establishment of an agency in England was esteemed as reprehensible because of its being viewed as a part of the system which was adopted to inflate the price of stock. The theatre was enlarged, and the demand increased. I cannot conceive how the domestic stockholder was to be benefited by the adoption of the measure. It certainly did not add one cent to the profits of the bank. It did not inspire it with increased ability to enlarge its discounts, and I, like the committee, feel that it can only have been intended for the purposes I have before stated.

Another expression has also been excepted to by the gentleman from South Carolina, viz: "that the loans actually made were most of them unreasonable and excessive in their amount; they were not made to the merchant and trader, but to a few persons, consisting of directors, brokers, and speculators." Loans, on a pledge of stock, were certainly made indiscriminately to all who applied, but that most of the large and excessive loans were made to the persons described, from my recollection of facts, admits of no doubt. True, sir, of the names of fourteen persons, which were selected, not from any information previously in the possession of the committee, but merely in consequence of the amount of the loans, we were informed that seven were merchants, five brokers, and two not falling under either description of character. Yet I wish to inquire of the gentleman, if the seven merchants were not actually dealers in stock; and whether the loans thus made were not owing to the fact, of the discounters having received a transfer of the stock, under the resolution of the board of directors, authorizing such transfer? I do not, therefore, esteem the expression in the report liable to the exception which has been taken to it. I repeat, the most of those who obtained large loans, on a pledge of stock, were actually speculators and brokers.

Having now, Mr. Chairman, disposed of the exceptions taken by the honorable member to some of the expressions of the report, I proceed to an investigation of the subject more immediately under consideration. The question whether it be proper to direct a scire facias against the bank divides itself into two heads of inquiry. First, whether the charter has been so violated as to incur a forfeiture? And if so, is it expedient to exact the forfeiture? The decision of the first would preclude me from an inquiry into the second. For, sir, inasmuch as I believe the creation of this corporation to be unconstitutional, I cannot, without a violation of my oath, hesitate to repair the breach thus made in the Constitution, when an opportunity presents itself of doing so, without violating the public faith. But, believing also, that it is expedient to put it down, and other gentlemen feeling themselves at liberty to follow up that inquiry, I propose to express to you my views on that subject.

I contend, then, Mr. Chairman, that this charter has been violated, and that, if subjected to investigation before a court of justice, it will be declared null and void. I would only have you look to the long catalogue of crime detailed in the report—to those practices calculated only to pamper a few, at the expense of the many—to the corruption which, by its illicit gains, almost laughs at your power. Shall we be told, with these facts staring us in the face, that this charter has not been violated? Say that no particular clause has been violated—that the votes were taken according to the first fundamental article in the charter—that the $7,000,000 in specie required has all been paid in—yet, I demand to know, if the great objects of the institution have not been defeated? You create a thing for good, and not for evil. Yet the good, in a great measure, vanishes, and evil alone exists. You incorporate a company for the purpose of advancing the interests of all concerned, and the machine thus created is managed, exclusively, for the aggrandizement of a few, and not for the good of all. Is not this, to adopt the rule laid down by the committee, so to misuse the powers granted, as to defeat the objects of the charter? The most reprehensible proceeding takes place—almost every object expressed in the charter is disappointed, and can it still be insisted that the corporation has not forfeited its franchises? It is a broad and great principle for which I contend. It is for the doctrine of responsibility due from the creature to the creator—the principle on which our Government is founded. The President is invested with certain powers; yet, if he abuses or misuses those powers, he forfeits his seat—the object of his election is disappointed—so, in regard to every other officer of the Government. Shall a corporation alone be irresponsible? There is nothing in reason or in law, to justify the idea. But, Mr. Chairman, if the position I have assumed, that a misuse of a franchise is a forfeiture thereof, is not sufficiently supported by reference to the principles of our Government, whither shall we look for still further argument?

The common law has been pronounced inoperative, in the courts of the Union, by many honorable gentlemen. But, sir, without stopping to inquire into the correctness of that position, I am willing to yield to those who hold a different doctrine all the benefits of the rules flowing from that source; and, under the principles of that law, I shall be able to demonstrate the correctness of the proposition for which I am contending. Nothing was more easily effected than the forfeiture of a franchise at common law. The statute of 18 Edward II. was an act to restore franchises to those who had lost them. Sandwich lost its privileges, immunities, and franchises, for a very slight cause. It had entered into a covenant with the abbot of St. Austin, in Canterbury, to deliver annually to the abbot a certain quantity of wine. It did not complete its engagement, but remained indebted on account thereof some twenty or thirty marks. For this sum, a suit was instituted, judgment obtained, and an execution issued, and levied on the property of the corporation; and because some of the inhabitants made a rescue of the property, it was judged by the court, and afterwards sanctioned by Parliament, that the town had forfeited its charter.

My honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. Johnson) referred you also to the case of the King vs. the city of London. I will refer gentlemen to the reasoning adopted by the Attorney General in that case, to corroborate and strengthen my position. These two cities, the one for the commission of a trespass, and the other for having exceeded its powers in imposing a market toll, were declared to have lost the privileges and immunities secured to them by successive acts of Parliament, and by magna charta itself. Compare those cases with the present case. What is this case? Sir, I forbear to represent it. I will only refer you to the mass of testimony, all which goes to show that the charter has been most shamefully perverted to the purposes of stockjobbing and speculation. I do not mean to insist that these cases are obligatory on us—far from it. I am, on the contrary, disposed to think, that it would comport better with our permanent good, if our courts would carve out for themselves a course of decision in consonance with the principles of our Government. But, if we are to refer to arguments arising under common law, I repeat again, that the argument delivered by the Attorney General, in the case of the King vs. the city of London, is well deserving of attention. That case has always been quoted as an evidence of acquiescence on the part of the English judiciary, to the arbitrary will of the monarch. But the reasoning in the case is not affected by that accusation against the court. But, in truth, we require no foreign precedents to govern us in deciding on this question of forfeiture. The charter contains a provision which will silence further inquiry. It expressly declares that, if a scire facias be directed, and the court believe that any violation of the charter has taken place, it shall pronounce it forfeited and null. Before we direct a scire facias, we have to satisfy ourselves of the same fact, and the question recurs, has any such violation taken place? That it has I have no doubt. Your great object in creating this corporation, was to reclaim the country from a flood of paper, irredeemable in specie. You wished a bank with a sufficient specie basis to cause its notes to pass currently for gold and silver. As a great means for accomplishing this object, certain fundamental articles were laid down. The first article limited the number of votes to be given by each stockholder. It was intended to deny to the large stockholders the power of defeating your intentions; and yet what it done? Evasion is resorted to, and in the outset the stipulations of the contract were violated, and instead of giving but thirty votes, one individual gives eleven hundred, on eleven hundred shares. The stockholder has accepted a covenant on certain positive conditions; he has agreed to carry it into execution in good faith, and yet, the moment after, he violates a fundamental article. He has also expressly agreed that it shall be fulfilled or forfeited; and still, when the fact of nonfulfilment is fully established, it is contended that no forfeiture ensues. I should rely strongly on the ground, that a violation of a fundamental article produced a forfeiture. That which is fundamental cannot be altered—cannot be changed. Can you remove the pillars of this charter, and yet expect it to stand? Can you remove the foundation, and yet expect the fabric to remain? It is only necessary to state the proposition, in order to receive the answer. The gentleman from South Carolina has contended, that this violation was the consequence of the acts of particular individuals, and not of the corporate body, and that therefore no forfeiture ensues. How many persons were concerned in the violation of this article, is at least problematical. Let it be recollected that Mr. Leiper states, in his deposition, and he was not only a director, but a judge of the election, that he divided his shares, and that it was generally done for the purpose of effecting the election. But, in addition to this, it never was discountenanced by the directors. They suffered the violation to take place under their very noses; many of them were individually concerned in it, and not a syllable of reprehension is uttered. But the position of the gentleman from South Carolina, is not based on legal principles. What is the definition of a corporation aggregate? A corporation aggregate is described to be "an artificial body, composed of divers constituent members, ad instar corporis humani; the ligaments of which artificial body are the franchises and liberties thereof, which bind and unite all its members together, and in which the whole frame and essence of the corporation consist." It is compared to a national body. Sir, if any one member of my body offend, the whole body bears the punishment. If my finger violates the law, my body pays the penalty. If my hand executes murder, that hand is not lopped off, but the ligaments and arteries of my system are cut asunder. With equal propriety might the natural body complain that it was made to suffer for the misdeeds of its members, as that a corporation aggregate should complain that it was made to bear the same relation to its members. If this were not the correct rule, I demand to know in what manner you would reach the guilty person?

But, Mr. Chairman, the effect of this violation does not stop here; if it did, it might be overlooked. I consider it the root and foundation of every evil. Shall I be considered as expressing myself too harshly when I say to you, that I ascribe the non-payment of the second instalment, to this very violation. I am not conscious of being wanting in charity; I am not aware of having too much gall or bitterness in my nature, nay, I would sooner, if I could, frame an apology for the errors of my fellow men, than expose them naked to the sight. But, does not the fact stare us palpably in the face, that the resolution of December, 1816, authorizing discounts to enable stockholders to pay up the second instalment, was intended, and actually applied, to the benefit of the stockholders residing in the vicinity of Philadelphia and Baltimore, whose influence had become overwhelming, in consequence of the violation of which I complain? The man who resided at a distance derived no benefit, no facility, under the resolution. He had not been among the knowing ones; he had not heard a whisper that such a resolution would be adopted, before its actual promulgation; he had prepared the specie and stock to meet his engagements, and did meet them. Was not this measure then not only calculated to defeat the payment of specie, but to disappoint the very inducement you held out for punctuality? The dividends of delinquent stockholders were declared to be forfeited, and yet this overweening influence had the effect to do away this salutary regulation, and to cause the benefits of punctuality to be distributed to all alike. Nor did the evil stop here. This same influence produced the resolution of the 25th August, 1817, authorizing the loans on stock at $125 per share, and the stockjobbing which followed. But I go further, and I feel myself authorized to make the declaration, that the present situation of this country—the distress in the mercantile world—the bankruptcies in your cities—are in a great measure ascribable to this very violation. What has produced the great drain of specie from the North? I will not repeat the reasoning contained in the reports; I will only remind you of the excessive drafts from Baltimore. The directors at Philadelphia saw the ruin which threatened them; they protested against the practice. What more could they do? They dare not act decisively; they could only supplicate, and entreat. And why not? George Williams answers the question—names could be obtained in Baltimore at eleven pence a piece. These excessive issues had the effect of producing a curtailment on the part of the United States Bank, and the State banks were driven to the adoption of the same system, as a measure of self-defence. Ruin and bankruptcy have been the inevitable effects. Sir, eighteen months ago we were prosperous and happy. What now is our situation? Gloom and despondence in our cities—usury stalking at large, and boasting of its illicit gains, while honesty and industry are covered with rags, the melancholy image of our changed condition. Does it not follow, then, that this was such a violation as was calculated to defeat the objects expressed in the charter? We are disappointed as to the mode of voting—as to the payment of specie—as to the dividends; and every measure calculated to produce evil has grown out of this; and yet my friend from South Carolina gravely contends that this charter is not forfeited!

I know it will be said that the course pursued in subscribing for the stock of other banks was similar to that pursued in regard to this, and that the charter in itself was not sufficiently guarded. For myself, I can listen to no such excuse. Was this stipulation entered into merely to gull and deceive? Did Congress, at the time of creating this charter, introduce this article that it might be violated? Did the stockholder, when he accepted it, accept it with a knowledge of this condition—and shall he be permitted to say, "true, I contracted with you on certain conditions, which I never intended to fulfil?" Did he sign it with good faith or with bad? That he has executed it in bad faith, there is no doubt; but I ask of honorable gentlemen to say, if they really do think that this stipulation was made out of mere sport, and to afford to the stockholder an opportunity of evincing his cunning and ingenuity? I have the authority of the charter to contradict such a conclusion. But, give the argument all the force you please, what will it avail? True, other banks may have suffered such violations of their charters, (I am, however, not cognizant of the fact,) and have been still suffered to exist. But, is the bare circumstance of their having escaped with impunity, any evidence of the legality of their conduct? Has the question ever been presented to a court of justice? In order that it should be urged as a justification of this violation, it must be shown to have received a legal sanction. You cannot justify illegal acts by illegal acts, or the violation of a contract by the violation of a previous contract. But the charter was not sufficiently guarded.

Can this position be relied on? What reply shall I make to it? Sir, I present the contract to your view. The stockholder had expressly stipulated to observe its provisions, and a faithful compliance on his part is guaranteed by the last clause, which declares, that, unless he fulfils his undertaking, the compact shall be forfeited and null.

[Here Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, it being at a late hour, and Mr. TYLER having given way, moved that the Committee should rise, which it accordingly did.]

On Monday morning Mr. TYLER resumed his argument of Saturday. He recapitulated the grounds he had taken, and begged leave to explain a remark which he then made in reply to Mr. LOWMEDES, as to the expression that most of the large and excessive loans were made to speculators. I feel myself authorized, he said, to repeat the assertion upon more mature reflection, aided by reference to a document in my possession. Let me not be misunderstood—when I speak of large loans, I do not mean loans of ten, twenty, or even forty thousand dollars. For, although these elsewhere would be considered large and excessive, yet, at Philadelphia, in looking over the books, the eye being attracted by greater objects, would scarcely rest on them for a moment. Sir, I will give you the amount of such loans as I allude to. One loan of $97,000 to one individual; two of $123,000 each; one of $140,000; another of $166,900; others of $277,000, $365,000, $400,000, and another of $1,800,000. Each of these is an individual loan, or, what amounts to the same thing, a loan to individuals and mercantile firms. I am not permitted to disclose the names of these discounters unless the House should demand the disclosure, which I should hope it would not do, as it would only have the effect of injuring private credit, and lead to no practical result. I have given you instances of the loans made to ten discounters, forming the enormous aggregate of $3,692,150. Can any one pretend to justify such a state of things? Is it to be countenanced by any correct banking principle? The bank has, in fact, committed an act of suicide against itself. Can it control the funds thus disposed of? If it adopts a system of curtailment, must not cases such as I have mentioned form exceptions to that system? If it imposes an equal share of curtailments on such persons with the other debtors of the bank, bankruptcy would be the inevitable consequence. Sir, the mother bank itself has, by its conduct, justified me in entertaining these opinions. It has resorted to a curtailment of its debts, and has never touched the discounts on pledged stock. From eight to ten millions of its debts have thus escaped reduction, and, of course, an increased pressure has fallen on our cities. I do not esteem it necessary to press any further this opinion. It must be obvious to all. What does this statement still further prove? Does it not prove the influence of the large stockholders over the institution, in consequence of the division of votes? Let not gentlemen deceive themselves in another point of view. The petition I presented you the other day, Mr. Chairman, brings to the bar of this House, with dejected countenance and eyes swimming with tears, the widow and the orphan, whose funds have been vested in this institution. They are made to utter curses against us if we take any step to put down this corporation. The picture is improperly filled up. It is the speculator, the stockjobber, who should have been presented, kneeling before us. He alone is now to be affected. The curses of the widow and the orphan will be uttered against them, not against us, for we are doing the innocent stockholder an act of justice, by relieving him from the company into which he has fallen, and returning him his money. I shall presently show that it is to his interest to have this bank put down. I hasten to a prominent instance of violation of this charter, and the last which I shall consider. I mean a failure to pay the instalments in specie and in funded debt, which, although a consequence of the preceding violation, deserves to be distinctly considered.

Will it be urged that the stockholders were authorized to pay in the notes of the bank? Upon what principle will this be justified? Will the course pursued by other banks furnish any justification? Why was this bank created? Was it to imitate the example of other banks, or to avoid their errors? The country was flooded with paper money. Our statesmen had sketched out blessings without number in the creation of a multiplicity of institutions. When the scheme first came up, wealth was promised to all. This land was to be converted into a garden. On paper wings we were to have soared to the height of our wishes. One dollar was to be manufactured into three. The manufactory of paper went on. The beggar's rags were even coveted, and the alleys of our streets ransacked for materials to convert into money. For a time all went on swimmingly. The dreams of wealth visited our pillows. The vision was brilliant—was enchanting. We fancied we held in our embraces youth, and beauty, and unspotted purity. But the sun rose, and the cup of our joy was dashed from our lips. Instead of holding in our arms the form of loveliness and virtue, we found ourselves in the embraces of an old and haggard witch, deformed in her features, corrupting by her example, and breathing around her ruin and misery. It was in truth the real image of bankruptcy. We had forgotten the fable of the dog and his shadow; for we had let go the substance and grasped nothing but empty air. We discovered, when it was too late, that we had exchanged gold and silver for worthless trash. The banks could not redeem their notes—they had to stop payment. At this moment the National Bank was thought of. The great object was to secure to it a specie payment, for which purpose seven millions of dollars was directed to be paid "in the gold or silver coin of Spain or of the United States." Has it been paid? It is admitted that it has not. Has not the charter, then, if it means anything, been violated? I reason on the principles of common sense. Can you manufacture gold and silver coin into paper? And, if this process cannot be performed at your mint, has the bank the possession of the secret? Yes, sir, it possesses the secret. Ask if the gold and silver has been paid; you are answered in the affirmative. Ask an explanation as to the manner, and you are told by the wise heads, "why, our paper is equivalent to specie, and the payment has been made in that." By the same process, too, is Government stock manufactured at the bank. But, it is urged that the bank was bound to redeem its notes in specie, and that, therefore, its notes were as good as specie. This presents another enigma. I should like to know how it was to be called on to redeem its notes before it had any in circulation? This secret was not discovered before the 18th December, 1816, and the second instalment fell due directly thereafter. And, if the bank had not gone into operation before the first of February, I should like to know where its notes were to be obtained? As to the second instalment, the position must fail. It is, however, said, that the charter did not contain provisions strong enough to compel a compliance. The forfeiture of the dividends was not sufficient. And yet, at the very moment that the inefficiency of this provision is complained of, the directors render it still more feeble and inefficient by throwing open the doors of the bank. The resolution confines the discounts to stockholders, thus enabling those who would otherwise have been delinquent to pay up the instalment, not in specie and funded debt, but by a bank accommodation. But, Mr. Chairman, I contend that the directors had full power to compel a compliance with the stipulations contained in the charter. They might have instituted suits in the courts of justice against those who might have been delinquent; by which means, I venture nothing when I say they could have recovered the amount of the instalment in specie and in Government stock, with interest from the time it should have been paid. But, if this course was doubtful, they might have resorted to a more efficient exercise of power. Suppose that the resolution of December, 1816, had been a resolution announcing to all, that, until the second instalment was paid, no delinquent stockholder should receive an accommodation at the bank. I verily believe that such a course would have produced the most beneficial effects. It would have either produced a payment of the instalment or a more equal distribution of the stock—the one subserving the objects of the charter, the other grappling with the spirit of speculation and overthrowing it in its infancy. It would have made it the decided interest of the large stockholder to have paid up. The men holding the largest quantity of stock are merchants. They, most of all others, require bank accommodation. The pressure of the times would have forced them to look to the bank for aid. I think, therefore, that the effect described would have flowed from the measure. And, if they could not have paid up on all their shares, they would only have retained so many as they could have paid for. No, sir, nothing of this sort could be done. The directors dare not have encountered the dislike of the large stockholders with their innumerable votes. I think it would have been manly, honorable in them, to have pursued such a course. They might have met complaints with the charter in their hand. They might have said to the stockholder, you have made a solemn compact with the Government. You are bound by every principle of honesty to effectuate your undertaking. When you have done so, and not before, can you expect any benefit from the institution.

As to the third instalment, I am ready to admit that the directors are not culpable for the manner of the payment. I do not require impossibilities to be performed. It was perhaps impracticable, by any regulation of the board, to have prevented an invasion of the charter. But yet the stockholder violated the covenant. He had no impossibility to perform; he was bound to pay in specie and in funded debt. Is it an excuse for him to say, it was easy for me to evade my contract, and I did evade it? Are we to submit to such mockery of justice? Do we sit here to countenance such evasions? What a farce, then, is your legislation! The gentleman from South Carolina contends that the bank had entered into a contract with the State banks, and that the proceedings, as to the second instalment, arose out of a desire, on the part of the bank, to fulfil that engagement. It is only necessary to say, that this, instead of diminishing, increases the error of the bank. It had no right to enter into a contract which should force upon it a violation of the charter; and, to carry into execution such contract, was doubly to violate the charter. But, if I am wrong here, I would inquire of the gentlemen, what is the date of the contract with the State banks? Sir, it is dated the last of January, 1817. When was the resolution to discount to stockholders adopted? One month before. So that it is perfectly obvious, that the bank was untrammelled by any engagement at the time of its having adopted the resolution to which I have alluded. But, sir, there was gross injustice, I will not say fraud, practised on the Government, and on those who had paid up the second instalment, by admitting those, who had availed themselves of the resolution, to come in for a share of the dividends. The first had paid up, according to contract; the other only cancelled one obligation, by entering into another. They discharged one bond by giving another. They added not one cent to the ability of the bank to discount; they contributed nothing to its capital, and added not a dollar to the specie in its vaults. If, then, the profits of the bank had been divided among those only who had paid up in specie and public stock, the dividend would have been greater to each. The bank traded on the specie and stock which my constituents and others paid in on the first and second instalments and divided the profits of trade with those who had not advanced a cent on the second instalment. It may be said that it was the loan to the stockholders, that caused the dividend to be as great. The position is not tenable. The bank obtained on the loan no more than six per cent., and this, without the loan, each delinquent would have been bound to pay; for the amount due for the instalment would have borne interest from the time it fell due. Shall we not only, then, suffer the charter to be violated, but submit to be deprived of our rightful gains? For one, I protest against it.

We have been told by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Lowndes,) that the subject of this violation has once heretofore been before us, and that, not having acted then, we should not act now. What was the fact? The House, soon after the adoption of the resolution of December, 1816, had it intimated to it that such a resolution had been adopted. The subject was referred to a committee, who made a report, founded on a letter from a director casually in this city, (Mr. Lloyd,) and which report was neither adopted nor rejected, but ordered to lie on the table. We had then only a partial view of the measure; we knew not in what spirit it had originated; we knew nothing of the violation of the first fundamental article of the charter; we saw not that it was but the bolt which opened the door to speculation and individual aggrandizement. These things were then concealed from our view. But, I ask the honorable gentleman to say, what measure we should then have adopted? Should we have taken upon ourselves the management of the bank? Did it belong to us to say to the directors, your resolution is a bad one, and in violation of the charter, therefore rescind it? Or, if we were not to pursue that course, does it make any difference whether we had then rescinded the charter, or do it now? Or yes, sir, there would have been some difference; a great difference in the cases. We should have been saved the pain of beholding the picture presented by the report and testimony; we should have been saved the sight of this cold and unfeeling speculation which has grown up among us. Nay, our reliance on the virtue and integrity of men standing high in our confidence, would have remained unshaken. And shall we now be referred to our former omissions, to justify still further omissions? Shall we now be told that, because we did not punish impropriety in its birth, we must not approach it when it has gained full size? Shall it be said that, because we did not punish the infant, we shall not extend retributive justice to the adult? No, sir, now is the time for us to interpose. Will not that overwhelming influence which heretofore has ruled, still rule? Will a change of directors be followed by a change of measures? Where is the security which you have against a continuance of the present course? Will the bill reported by the committee produce a change? I question your right to pass it. You can annex no new penalties. The contract has been accepted, on certain conditions, and I know not where your power is to be found to alter or enlarge them.

Mr. Chairman, it seems that we owe something like gratitude to this bank for having brought about specie payments. It is with difficulty I bring myself to differ with the gentleman from South Carolina, upon any question connected with mercantile or banking operations; but I cannot admit the correctness of this position to the extent that he would carry it. I think that the incorporation of the United States Bank was calculated to delay the resumption of specie payments on the part of the State banks. If I am not mistaken, the State banks had made preparatory arrangements towards the resumption of specie payments; they had curtailed their discounts; but the creation of this bank forced upon them, as a measure of self-preservation, a continuance of the course they had adopted. Specie being required on the part of the stockholders of this institution, they would, if the State banks had opened their vaults, have collected their notes, and drained their specie, to the amount of said instalments. I think, therefore, that the State institutions were left but one course, and that was the very course they did persist in until the 20th of February, 1817. But, sir, what is the nature of the contract entered into between the United States Bank and State banks? What great sacrifice did this corporation make on the altar of public good? The State banks owed to the Government balances on account of deposits; and this bank gives them until the 1st July, 1817, a period of upwards of five months, to pay up those balances. They are, however, in the meantime, liquidated, and made to carry an interest of six per cent. Is this the distinguished and patriotic act which is to restrain further proceedings against this body corporate? It adds to its profits by the contract—liquidates a debt—receives an interest, not on its own funds, but on those of the Government—specifies a day for the payment, and this is to cover all its sins and follies. It could not better have subserved its own interests. It swelled its profits, without advancing a cent. True it agreed to throw into circulation, a given quantity of notes by the 1st of July; but, I ask, if the amount of the discounts contracted to be made are greater than, without the contract, it would have made? I cannot then discover any cause of gratitude, growing out of this proceeding? Mr. Chairman, I look to a more efficient cause for the resumption of specie payments. I look to the resolutions of the State Legislatures; to the resolution of Congress, requiring the payment of all dues to the Government to be made in specie, or the notes of banks paying specie, after the 20th February, 1817, as the great cause of this resumption. I am disposed to ascribe more energy to the arm of this Government than to any moneyed institution.

Under every view, then, which I have been able to take, I think that the bank has forfeited its charter; or at least that it becomes us to direct the scire facias. If we differ on the subject of violation and forfeiture, submit it to the court to settle the question. It is the mode pointed out in the charter, and against it the stockholders can have no good objection.

There remains now but one branch of inquiry with those who do not think the creation of this corporation an unconstitutional act, viz: Is it expedient to direct a scire facias, or, in other words, to put down this corporation? I contend that it is. For one, I enter my protest against the banking system; a system not to be supported by any correct principles of political economy. A gross delusion—the dream of a visionary—a system which has done more to corrupt the morals of society than anything else—which has introduced a struggle for wealth, instead of that honorable struggle which governs the actions of a patriot, and makes ambition virtue; which has made the husbandman spurn his cottage, and introduced a spirit of luxury at variance with the simplicity of our institutions. I call upon the warm advocates of banking now to surrender their errors. Shall I take them by the hand, and lead them through our cities? Bankruptcy meets us at every step; ruin stares us everywhere in the face. Shall I be told of the benefits arising to commerce from the concentration of capital? Away with the delusion; experience has exposed its fallacy. True, for a moment it has operated as a stimulus; but, like ardent spirit, it has produced activity and energy but for a moment; relaxation has followed, and the torpor of death has ensued. When you first open your bank, much bustle ensues; a fictitious goddess, pretending to be Wealth, stands at the door, inviting all to enter and receive accommodation. Splendid palaces arise; the ocean is covered with sails; but some alteration in the state of the country takes place; and, when the thoughtless adventurer, seated in the midst of his family, in the imaginary enjoyment of permanent security, sketches out to himself long and halcyon days, his prospects are overshadowed, and misery, ruin, and bankruptcy make their appearance, in the form of bank curtailments. If this be true, and I appeal to the knowledge of all men for its truth, I demand to know if you can put down the system too soon? Can we too soon escape the dangers by which we are surrounded? I know I shall be told that, even if we put down this bank, the State banks will still exist. Even if true, the position is not a justifiable one. If the State Legislatures do not follow the example which we set them, we shall have acquitted ourselves of our duty. It is all that can be asked of us. But, sir, we actually possess the lever of Archimedes, and have a foot of ground on which to rest it. Our revenue amounts to upwards of twenty million dollars annually. Require but a fourth, or even a sixth, to be paid in gold or silver, what would be the effect? The merchants would collect the notes of banks and demand specie for them; and thus a test would be adopted, by means of which to ascertain the solvency of each institution. The demand for specie thus produced would have the beneficial effect of introducing more of it into the country; for money is like every other article, and will find its way to the market where it is most wanting. The system might be enlarged gradually, until your wishes should be consummated. I know the ground which I occupy, when I urge these considerations upon you. A man, regardless alone of the fleeting and ephemeral popularity of the hour, would hesitate in pressing them upon you. But I should not hold myself entitled to your countenance, Mr. Chairman, to the countenance of honest men, or, what is still more important, the approbation of my conscience, if I could be operated on by such motives or fears. Pardon me for still further extending this inquiry. There are three parties interested in the question which we are called on to decide—the stockholder, the debtor, and the Government. I contend that it is to the interest of the honest stockholder to put down this bank.

The interest of the stockholder consists in the amount of dividends which he receives. At this time he receives but two and a half per cent. semi-annually. Will the dividend increase or diminish? Sir, it has constantly been diminishing, and must continue to diminish. The bank has now but two million seven hundred thousand dollars of specie in its vaults, and that sum is daily and hourly diminishing. Experience is the best guide, and that of the last three years proves, beyond doubt, the rapid and incessant drain of specie from the vaults. Let the direction be changed; let an entire new system be adopted; the East India trade will still continue, and the demand for gold and silver will remain unchanged. From what quarter, then, will the bank supply deficiencies? It originally had fifteen million dollars of United States stock paid in by individuals; all of which has been redeemed or sold, with the exception of between three and four hundred thousand dollars. This, then, would constitute but a slender reliance. To what other source will it look? It has a balance due it from State banks. Can it rely on that? A great proportion thereof is due from the Western banks; and the very instant that the Bank of the United States made a demand for specie, they have closed their doors, or stopped specie payments. Are the other banks of the Union in a better situation? Many, no doubt, are; but look to the report of the condition of the banks of this District. One has a large amount of notes in circulation, and thirty thousand dollars in its vaults and on the road. Whether it has more than a dollar in its vaults or not, the amount may still be true; others are in no better a situation; while some few are solvent and able to pay. This, too, is a litter of Congressional creation. Look to Pennsylvania:

a report of the condition of its banks has been made, if I am not misinformed, by order of the Legislature. They have immense sums in circulation, and scarcely paper enough to carry on their daily operations. Nay, sir, one bank, if I am not deceived, with a large amount of notes out, has not one cent of gold or silver in its vaults. A bank in Philadelphia, its title I forget, and some other of the banks, appear to have been judiciously conducted. From the other States I have seen no return which can positively be relied on. But I think the two references I have made go far to show that the United States Bank cannot rely for a supply of specie on the balances due from State banks. If it looks to the stock subscribed by Government, the commissioners of the sinking fund will be bound in duty to redeem it, if it should be brought into market, and sold either at or under par. And the payment would be made by a transfer of Government deposits, by which operation not a cent of specie might be added to the bank. But say that it is sold for gold and silver; a diminution of the dividend will still take place. The stock is an active capital, and yields five per cent. annually; convert it into money, and the bank will have made an exchange of an active for an inactive and unproductive capital. The same thing takes place if it curtails its discounts. And at this moment that is the course which it is driven to pursue. I venture nothing, then, when I predict that, for several years to come, if ever, it will not divide a greater profit than one and a half or two per cent. semi-annually. Return, then, to the stockholder his money; suffer him to use it in his own way; he will, whatever he may do in the first moment of disappointment, in the end have cause to thank you. At this moment the institution is solvent; and although I would not expressly say that it would be able to return one hundred dollars on each share, (for I have not the data on which to make up an opinion,) yet I am certain its ability would not fall far short of that point. Let not gentlemen, then, deceive themselves. The widow will not curse, but bless you; the orphan will not meet us with tears, but with smiles; the land will no longer labor under a flattering delusion; and the speculator alone, who has reduced us to our present condition, will be punished for his misdeeds.

What effect will it produce on the debtor of the bank? Let us not conjure up fancies to alarm us. It is the part of children to tremble at the appearance of danger, however unreal; it is the part of men, by facing, to overcome difficulties. My friend from South Carolina has presented you a gloomy picture of distress. I regard it as the production of a vivid imagination. Let us test it by reference to facts. The old United States Bank had a large sum due it; I believe eighteen or twenty million dollars. At the time of its dissolution, the same terrible fancies possessed men's minds. Yet the result proved them to be visionary; and the impression made by its dissolution has long since disappeared. What is the amount due to this bank? Only $27,000,000, from which is properly to be deducted $3,000,000, for individual deposits, leaving $24,000,000, a sum scarcely equal to the revenue annually paid to the Government, without difficulty or embarrassment. But the payment would be gradual. Issue a scire facias, and, presuming that it would require two years to bring it to trial, the bank might thus draw in its debts imperceptibly and without any greater pressure than arises from an ordinary curtailment. This is one reason which operates on me to prefer a scire facias to any other remedy. But, after the charter should be pronounced null and void, this House would not hesitate to extend to it a protracted existence, to enable it to wind up its affairs. The gentleman from South Carolina thinks that it would press forth with for payment. It would pursue its true interest, and that would induce it to prefer the mode I suggest, to the one he supposes would take place. It would not hazard the loss of debt by an imprudent haste in collecting it. In stating the amount due to the bank, I have omitted the amount on pledged stock; on a final settlement, it would balance itself.

There remains then to be considered but one other point: How would the Government be affected by a dissolution of the charter? I protest against the idea, that the Government cannot get on without this bank. We are not dependent on this corporation. Wretched indeed would be our situation if such was the case. Sir, I have every confidence in the ability and talent of the Secretary of the Treasury to devise some scheme as a substitute for the present. We shall pay too much for the facilities which are afforded the Treasury by this institution. If my previous reasoning be correct, a reduction of dividend will take place. How then does the Government stand affected? It pays annually, on the $7,000,000 which it subscribed, an interest of five per cent. amounting to $350,000. What will it receive? Estimating the dividend at two per cent. semi-annually, it receives but $280,000, and thereby it will lose $70,000 annually. Will not this be to pay too dearly for our whistle? Your old loan office system cost you not so much. But, sir, the gentleman from South Carolina tells us of the losses we sustained during the war, in the absence of this his favorite system. We did sustain losses, but what was the cause? They arose entirely from the indiscriminate reception of bank notes. If the Treasury had discriminated properly among the banks, refusing to receive the notes of any but such as were known to be solvent, the loss would not have been felt. But, even under the reprehensible procedure which then existed, we are told that the Government only sustained a loss of $500,000. Are we blind to inconveniences of the present system? What is the fact in regard to the West? Sir, the Western people owe you many millions for the purchases of your public lands, and are unable to pay you. It is the very quarter, too, from which you expect to be able to extinguish the public debt. Those people cannot pay. A large stream of revenue, then, here dammed up, and can no longer flow into the Treasury. Whatever inconveniences may result from it, you cannot press the collection without ruining thousands.

I do not mean to censure the bank for this state of things; but, when gentlemen take this institution to their arms, and represent it as a garment covering our errors, and an angel ministering to our wants, I demand that they shall retract their opinions. Will the country be in a better situation, should we be involved in another war, than we were during the late war? I think not. Each branch is forced to redeem its own notes. In this respect they are placed on the footing of State banks. Our internal commerce being cut off, the ordinary channels of intercourse being blocked up between the States, the current of trade will pour again from the South to the North, and a similar depreciation of the southern branch notes will take place. We shall find ourselves surrounded by as great embarrassments then, as we have lately experienced. I know the enlarged and comprehensive views of my friend from South Carolina. He surely will not consent to legislate alone for the passing hour. He would not cherish and foster a system which can alone exist under the smile of peace, and would wither and perish under the frown of war. And yet, sir, I feel that the present system is one of that description.

Would it be a task of any great difficulty to substitute another system for this? I submit it to honorable gentlemen to say whether, in the event of Government's selecting a bank in each State, notoriously solvent, in lieu of the present, we should not be precisely situated as we now are? You take a bank in Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Richmond, &c., known to be solvent, and bestow upon it the same countenance you bestow on the branches of this bank, limiting the reception of the revenue entirely to their notes, or specie, and giving them the public deposits. Will gentlemen assign any good reasons for supposing that the notes of such banks would not circulate as currently and uniformly as those of this institution? The note of the Richmond bank, for example, being received everywhere in payment of Government dues, would be as readily caught up by the merchant as a note of this bank, payable alone at Richmond. When you estimate the amount of specie in the vaults of such State banks as I have alluded to, it will be found greatly to exceed the amount in the vaults of this bank and its branches. There is no difficulty in devising a substitute; and, I repeat, that if the gentleman from South Carolina had united with me in devising a perfect scheme, the country would have had cause to have thanked him for his exertions. Nor is there any necessity for alarm for the safety of Government deposits. The State banks, thus selected, would most readily consent to exhibit to the Secretary of the Treasury monthly and quarterly accounts of their actual condition. There existed no difficulty on that head when the old charter expired. Thus then the Government would render as secure its funds under such a system as under the present.

Mr. Chairman, all the reasons now urged were urged in favor of a renewal of a charter of the old bank, and yet they did not prevail. The members of the then Congress went fearlessly and boldly to work. Difficulties did not appal them; fears did not unnerve them. Shall we be less resolute? Sir, when this bank was created, the then Secretary of the Treasury represented it as an indispensable measure to support our credit. He represented the purses of our citizens to have been emptied by the excessive loans they had made to the Government. He could go no further: a loan was contemplated to be obtained from this bank. I confess I regard it with fear and trembling in this respect. It would be an act of political suicide to borrow a large sum from this bank; and yet, fancy yourselves surrounded with difficulties and embarrassments similar to those we have lately escaped from—the expedient of the moment would be resorted to; a large issue of paper would thus take place, and an irredeemable character be stamped upon it. Then, indeed, might we bid adieu to all our happiness and all our wealth. Public confidence would wither like the blighted plantain; that noble spirit of enterprise, which has characterized our citizens, would perish and decay; the merchant would bid adieu to his counting house; the farmer would sigh over the waste of his fields. Why should the one encounter the storm of the deep, or the other witness the sweat of his brow, when, for their hardships and labor, they would be paid in a worthless currency, of no intrinsic value in itself, and constantly undergoing a depreciation in value? I entreat gentlemen to arrest the evil now that they can. Sir, I was astonished at the argument of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. He contended that the great object of the charter had been answered; that every facility had been afforded to the operations of the Treasury, and, therefore, that no forfeiture had ensued. What is this but to say to the bank, take care only to be the glove to the hand of the Treasury; obey its wishes; facilitate its schemes and operations, and do whatever else you please—you shall not be arrested; swindle, and cheat, and deceive the unthinking people of this country, without mercy and without end; only take care to secure the smiles of the Treasury, and all shall be smooth and well? Is it not actually granting to the bank a patent to offend? It is only necessary that it should apply at the Patent Office, and receive its license under the sign-manual of Doctor Thornton. I cannot listen to such a position. I call upon the warmest advocates of this system, although I am satisfied that that call is in vain, to unite with me in this measure. You have been disappointed in your wishes, in your expectations. Instead of a system abounding in blessings, it has been converted into an instrument of corruption. Cold unfeeling speculation has usurped the place of honest dealing. Are we not too young to encourage such a state of things? Our Republic can only be preserved by a strict adherence to virtue. It is our duty, if we consult our eternal good, to put down this first instance of detected corruption, and thereby to preserve ourselves from its contamination. The bank is already interwoven with the affections of many; its influence will become every day more and more extensive, and, if we suffer this opportunity to escape, we may sigh over our unhappy condition, but that will be the only privilege which will be left us. Let my fate be what it may, I have discharged my duty, and I am regardless of the consequences.

MONDAY, February 22.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Michael Hogan," and "An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis de la Ronde;" reported the said bills with an amendment to each; when it was ordered that the said bills be committed to the same Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the joint committee appointed to inquire and report what business it will be necessary to act upon during the present session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN,

Resolved, That the judges of the courts of the several districts of the United States be requested to prepare and transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as early as may be, at the next session of Congress, a schedule of fees of office, proper to be allowed and taxed for the officers of their courts respectively; and that the Clerk of this House cause each of said judges to be furnished with a copy of this resolution.

The bill supplementary to the act for the relief of Benjamin Wells was taken up and ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the Senate supplementary to the several acts concerning the coasting trade was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

The engrossed bill in addition to the act supplementary to the act for the relief of Thomas Wilson; and the engrossed resolution prescribing the mode of naming the vessels of the United States, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the heirs of William Reed, was read the third time, and, on the question of its passage, was rejected.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform this House whether any, and, if any, what part of the balances transferred from the State banks to the Bank of the United States, under the second article of the compact between them, for which balances the Bank of the United States was to receive interest, were retained by the Bank of the United States as special deposits, for which it was not obliged to pay specie upon demand.

Bank of the United States.

H. or R.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform this House whether any, and, if any, what part of the balances transferred from the Treasury to the United States Bank, under the second proposition of its agreement with the receiving banks, of the 31st January, 1817, were drawn from the Bank of the United States by any department of Government, between the 31st January and 1st of July, 1817, exclusive of the sums required by the Treasury, under the exception contained in the second proposition.

DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. TERRY, from the committee to which was referred the petition of the Connecticut Asylum, for the education and instruction of deaf and dumb persons, made a report, which was read; when Mr. T. reported a bill in behalf of the Connecticut Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb; which was twice read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

That an association of a number of citizens of the State of Connecticut was formed in the year 1815, for the purpose of establishing a school for the instruction of the deaf and dumb. Finding great numbers of this unfortunate description of persons in our country without education, and without any attempts being made to give them the education which they are capable of receiving, and actuated by a benevolent desire to rescue them, as far as was practicable, from their state of ignorance and degradation, and to fit them for social intercourse and happiness, the associates, by voluntary contribution, raised a sum of money sufficient to defray the expense of sending the reverend Thomas H. Gallaudet to Europe, for the purpose of learning the modes of instruction practised there. Mr. Gallaudet went to England, to Scotland, and to France. In London, he did not find a disposition in the teachers to communicate instruction so readily as the benevolence of his mission seemed to entitle him to expect; but he had the good fortune to meet there the Abbe Sicard, the principal of the institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb at Paris, a gentleman distinguished for talents, benevolence, and devotion to the interests of these unfortunate persons. The Abbe assured him that, if he would go to Paris, every facility should be afforded him of acquiring a knowledge of their modes of instruction; which assurances he found fully realized upon going there. The Abbe kindly took him into the school, and explained to him everything relating to their modes of instruction and management; but Mr. Gallaudet found that the time which his arrangements would permit him to spend in Paris would be much too short to enable him to acquire the knowledge necessary for an accomplished instructor; and having become acquainted with Laurent Clerc, a pupil of the Abbe, and for eight years an assistant instructor, he engaged him to come to this country as an instructor in the school about to be established in Connecticut. They arrived here in August, 1816, and Mr. Clerc is still an assistant to Mr. Gallaudet in the Connecticut Asylum. The Legislature of Connecticut, in May, 1816, incorporated the said associates by their aforesaid name. There are at present in the school more than fifty pupils, from the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania,

Maryland, Virginia, and Kentucky, who are taught by five instructors, and who pay $200 per annum, each, for tuition, board, washing, and lodging. The institution is open for the reception of pupils from every part of the Union; but its funds (which have arisen almost entirely from voluntary contribution) are too small to admit of its becoming extensively useful; they are not sufficient even to erect the buildings necessary for the accommodation of the present number of pupils.

Considering that this institution is calculated not only to afford instruction to the deaf and dumb, who are to be found in all parts of our country, but also to qualify teachers for other schools which may be established in other parts of the Union, and considering that it is the first attempt of the kind in the United States, and that it has been raised to its present condition by the care and at the expense of charitable individuals, most of whom had no particular interest in its success, the committee are of opinion that it is worthy of the patronage of Congress, and that the prayer of the petition ought to be granted; and for that purpose they report a bill.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BASSETT in the chair,) on the subject of the Bank of the United States—Mr. JOHNSON's motion to repeal the charter still under consideration.

Mr. TYLER concluded the argument which he commenced on Saturday in favor of the motion, and in reply to Mr. LOWNDES, occupying nearly two hours to-day—as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. McLANE of Delaware, said that the late period of the session, the mass of important business yet remaining to be transacted, and the impatience manifested by the Committee in the course of this debate, though upon a subject of such magnitude, admonished him of the impropriety of tasking their attention for any great length of time. He would not have participated in the debate at all, if he had not had the honor to be a member of the committee whose investigation and report had given rise to the present discussion, and if it had not been his lot to differ in opinion with a majority of his colleagues on many of the most important matters in the report. On this account, he believed it a duty he owed to himself and to the House, to state the views he entertained, and the reasons upon which his opinion had been formed.

The able and detailed remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) would save him much trouble, and justify him in abridging the observations which he otherwise should have felt it his duty to make.

Mr. McLANE said, he entirely concurred in most of the views and opinions which had been expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, unless, indeed, he was to be understood as denying the existence of any abuses whatsoever, in the conduct of any of those to whom the management of the Bank of the United States had been confided. [Mr. LOWNDES here stated that it was certainly not his intention to make any such denial.] Mr. McL. said, he was sure it could not be denied that many abuses had been committed by some of the individual directors, though, perhaps, in many instances, in their unofficial character. He said, he had entered upon the arduous and responsible duties assigned to him, with no unfavorable impressions towards the institution; and though he had heard numerous charges made against it, from various quarters, they had been unaccompanied by such proof as would be calculated to make a serious impression. [In patiently investigating the circumstances under which the institution commenced its operations, and continued its progress, and in tracing its management, and the transactions of its officers—he had seen much to admire—something too to condemn, and in the conduct of some of the directors and other officers, something to reprobate. But he had nowhere discovered abuses of so enormous a character as to be remedied by milder correctives than total extinction of the incorporation—a measure carrying in its train the most disastrous consequences to all parts of the community. He would not now detain the Committee in a particular consideration of the different acts which in his opinion were or were not abuses; or of the degree of censure which they merited. He did not consider himself here as the accuser or defender of the bank and its officers; but, as a Representative of the American people, called to decide upon the propriety of certain important measures, intimately connected with their interests and prosperity. Of these, he should not be unmindful, because of the mismanagement in the Bank of the United States, and so far as he deemed it material, to adjust the decision upon these measures, to express his opinion in regard to the condition of the bank and the conduct of its officers, he should take occasion to do so in the course of the observations he should have the honor to make.]

Mr. McL. said there were three propositions before the Committee. The first proposes to pass a law repealing the charter heretofore granted, incorporating the bank; the second, to direct a scire facias to compel a forfeiture of the charter; and the third, to direct a scire facias to be hereafter waived, if the corporation will consent to certain modifications of their charter. He said he was opposed to all of them.

He denied the Constitutional power of Congress to pass a law repealing or dissolving the charter, and he said the arguments of its advocates proceeded upon mistaken principles, even in regard to the common law, whence some of them had drawn their deductions.

The honorable mover of this proposition (Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia) contends, that the law granting the charter is wholly unconstitutional, that common and civil law are both inoperative in the United States, and therefore, that, as we cannot resort to the remedies afforded by either of these, we have nothing left but to repeal the charter by an act of Congress. But, Mr. McL. said, if the honorable gentleman were correct in his premises, he would be left without any law at all, excepting the mere arbitrary exercise of power. The charter, however, had relieved us from these embarrassments, by prescribing a remedy whenever a forfeiture should be incurred, the only event in which, as he should contend, Congress could interfere. Another honorable gentleman who followed the mover, in support of the proposition to repeal (Mr. PINDALL, from Virginia) insists, that the common law is operative in the United States, and contends for the right to repeal, in virtue of the power exercised by Parliament, and the visitatorial power, which he says is, in this instance, in Congress, as the founder of the incorporation. If the gentleman were right, in supposing the visitatorial power to be in Congress, and susceptible of use as extensive as in England, it would not support his position. For, said Mr. McL., the visitatorial power is not a destroying, but a correcting, remedial power. The visitor has no power to destroy the being of a corporation. His office and authority are founded, in the language of the best writers, "upon the supposition that corporations, being composed of individuals subject to human frailties, are liable, as well as private persons, to deviate from the end of their institution; and for that reason, the law provides proper persons to visit, inquire into, and correct all irregularities that arise in such corporations." Although in England, this visitatorial power has a very extensive operation, I never heard of an instance, I believe none can be furnished, in which it attempted to dissolve the corporation. Nor is the power necessarily in the founder; it may be in any other person designated by the charter, and though in England the King is considered as the general founder, and the visitor, if no other be named, he never exercises his power in his own person, but always in his courts of justice; before whom the corporations are brought by proper process; are heard in their defence, and the abuses or irregularities, if any are found to exist, are corrected. The King himself cannot dissolve a corporation of which he was the founder, and which he may have created by letters patent; it can only be done by the interference of Parliament; than which, a more conclusive argument could not be afforded, that the visitatorial office does not possess the power of dissolution. It is unnecessary, at present, to institute any inquiry into the nature of this power, in this country, or in what department of the Government it may be vested, since, wherever it may be vested, it would give no authority to repeal the charter. The powers of Congress are clearly defined in the charter; the means of enforcing a forfeiture are distinctly provided; and the control of the Secretary of the Treasury over the public deposits is sufficient for ordinary cases. It may well be questioned, however, whether any greater power than this exists in any department of the Government.

But gentlemen say, that one Legislature has the same power that another had, and that therefore we may repeal any law that a preceding Congress passed. This principle cannot be con-troverted, as it respects general legislation, affecting public rights and general police; but if an act be done under any law, a succeeding Legislature cannot undo it. Where a law is in its nature a contract, as all grants are, and absolute rights have vested under the contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest those rights. This is the nature of the law in question. Congress, in giving this charter creating the corporation, granted to the individuals who should become members of it, certain privileges and franchises, and stipulated, upon the faith of the Government, that they should enjoy it for a definite period; it granted them the right of becoming a corporation and carrying on the business of banking, or owning property in the stock of the institution, and of exercising all the privileges of ownership for the same period of time. Under this grant, these rights have become vested interests, as much so as a right to take toll for twenty years, or a right to a fee simple interest in land, where, by an act of Congress, the title has been granted to an individual. As such they are considered in all countries, under our own laws, and by the decisions of our own courts. They are so treated in England; though there a charter may be dissolved by an act of Parliament, because of the attribute of omnipotence with which it is invested, and by which it rides over public and private rights with the same supremacy. Happily for our country, no branch of our Government is clothed with this attribute. Here, every department of our Government is controlled by precisely defined principles impressed upon their first institution. In England the legislature makes and controls the Constitution. Here, the Constitution limits and controls the legislature. Here the legislative power can make no "ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts," and "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The provision applies equally to contracts in which the public are the party, and where individuals only are concerned. If possible, it applies with greater force, since the public faith ought, at all times, to be sacred and inviolable. In the formation of our Government, its different powers are apportioned among the respective branches, each acting in its appropriate sphere: the legislature makes the law, or authorizes the grant; the judiciary expounds them, and hears and decides all matters of litigation, and the executive superintends their execution. If individuals in the community have conflicting claims, arising under the laws of the United States, either in contract or otherwise, the judiciary is the tribunal to which their rights are referred.

The public authorities, as it regards their contracts, cannot claim, nor should they desire to claim, any other exemption. The Legislature should carefully abstain from the exercise of mere arbitrary power. As they value the stability of our institutions, they "must in all cases submit their pretensions to those tribunals established for the security of property, and to decide human rights." We cannot therefore repeal this charter, nor can we claim to be released from the performance of our stipulations in good faith, unless the condition upon which the grant was made, and the individual rights vested, have been broken. But this can only be ascertained by due process of law. If we allege that it has been broken, we are bound to prove it; we must resort to the Judiciary; we must afford the party whose interests and property are to be taken away, an opportunity of being heard. The Bank of the United States has not yet been heard. The proceedings, so far, have been ex parte. He did not mean to say that the investigation had not been conducted impartially, and with good faith. He was sure it had been so conducted, but still it was ex parte. The report of the committee is, at most, but the finding of a grand jury; it concludes nothing. To pass a law repealing the charter, therefore, would not only be an assumption of judicial powers, which do not belong to us, but it would be deciding in our own cause, in our own favor, and without hearing the opposite party.

But gentlemen say that the law incorporating the bank was unconstitutional, and that therefore we are not bound by it, and may of course repeal it. Mr. McL. said that, although he entertained no doubt that the law was Constitutional, and that it could easily be demonstrated to be so, he should not discuss that question, since he insisted that we now had no right to discuss the validity of the charter. He held it to be an essential principle of our Government, that any law once passed by the regular authorities was to be taken to be Constitutional, until the judicial tribunals should decide otherwise. The safety of our institutions, and the faith of individual transactions, depended upon this principle. The Congress of the United States is a party to the grant of this charter—to the contract under which private rights have become vested—and for a party to decide his own deed to be invalid, whatever cause may be assigned for its invalidity, would manifestly be an act of bad faith; it would be a mere act of power, without the shadow of right. The Congress who granted the charter would have had no right to say so, and it will not be pretended that we have greater powers than they had.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., this repealing law, if passed, would be nugatory, and of no effect. Gentlemen have not yet claimed for Congress that omnipotence which would authorize us to revoke our own grants, and annul our own contracts, as a mere matter of power and caprice. They have admitted that either the original law must be unconstitutional, or a breach of the condition on which it was granted must be committed, before Congress can interfere. Now, if the charter were unconstitutional, it would be absolutely null and void without the repealing law: the repealing law could not make it more so. It could only add one more question to the matters in dispute, and it would immediately be contended (and he thought with much greater propriety) that the repealing law was unconstitutional and void, and that the charter was good. If we proceed upon the ground of a breach of the condition, the effect of our law, even in the contemplation of its advocates, would depend upon the fact; and, in both instances, the Judiciary would have to decide the controversy. For even in England, where the power of dissolving an incorporation is in Parliament, the act passed for that purpose is always enforced in the Court of King's Bench; and, until the court pronounces the judgment, the corporation continues the exercise of its franchises. In this instance gentlemen may be assured that the stockholders of the Bank of the United States would not voluntarily acquiesce in the law. We should be compelled to resort to the Judiciary for some process to enforce it, (if indeed gentlemen would be able to devise any, in the absence of all common law, and under a void charter,) and at last a hearing would take place, and the Judiciary would decide between us.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., it clearly results from all that has been said, that, after granting this charter, under which there now exist vested rights, we are bound by our own act, unless a forfeiture has been incurred. In such an event the Government, as a party to the contract, have stipulated the remedy, and the mode in which the question is to be tried, and the forfeiture enforced. We have stipulated that if, after a committee of either House of Congress shall have reported that the charter has been violated, we deem it expedient to vacate the charter, we will direct a scire facias to issue; and we have secured to the corporation the right of trial by jury, and the judgment of the court, before their rights can be affected. This is a solemn stipulation, made for the mutual benefit of both parties; we cannot depart from it, without an utter disregard of the national faith.

Before we resort to this remedy, Mr. Chairman, we should be satisfied, in the first place, that the charter has been forfeited; and, secondly, that it is expedient to enforce a forfeiture. For, although the act vests you with the power to direct a scire facias after your committee have reported a violation, it does not make it obligatory upon you to do so, even should you concur in opinion with the committee. It leaves you with the important option and privilege, possessed by every individual, of taking advantage of a breach of contract by the opposite party, or of waiving it, at your pleasure; with this material difference, that in the case of the individual, he considers only his personal feelings and interest; in the instance of the Government, it is to consult, not its feelings, but the interests and welfare of the whole nation. In the exercise of this privilege, therefore, national safety and individual happiness, private rights, as well as public policy and public good, are all-important considerations. There is also every reason why it should be clear that the violations reported would be sufficient to incur a forfeiture; not only because such could be the only legitimate objects of the proceeding, but, if the question were doubtful, it would be inconsistent with the duty we owe to that part of the community whose interests are involved in the institution to direct a scire facias. The inception of such a proceeding would be very apt to be fatal to the bank. It is an institution subsisting upon a sound credit, and the confidence the community entertain in its existence and permanence. If these are once shaken, there is an end of its utility—of its entire capacity. Imputations of impurity are not more fatal to the fair and just superiority and loveliness of the female character, than would be those of instability and weakness against the credit and confidence of this institution. They would leave it exposed to the assaults of every petty hostility. A scire facias would be invested with the expression of the deliberate opinion that Congress—an opinion always entitled to great weight with the American people—that a forfeiture had been incurred, and public calculations would be made accordingly. A loss of public confidence would ensue; a general pressure by its creditors from all quarters; a depreciation of its paper; the withdrawal of private deposits, and, of necessity, those of the public;—would be the inevitable consequences. And when it is considered that this state of things would continue, and gradually become worse, during the time that would necessarily elapse before the question could be decided, it appears to me impossible that the bank could survive the shock, although the charter should be ultimately sustained.

Is it clear, then, said Mr. McL., that the acts of violation reported by the committee will incur a forfeiture? He believed not; he was persuaded that the courts of the United States would not decree a forfeiture on the ground of any or all of these acts. He would not deny, that, in these cases, some of the provisions of the charter had not been literally complied with; though in none of them had the spirit or intention been evaded, or the great and leading ends and objects of the institution been defeated. He observed, that the doctrine of a forfeiture of charter, and especially in regard to the acts which would or would not produce it, was a novel one in this country, and obscured in some difficulty. The annals of our own history afford us no precedents, there never having been, to his knowledge, an attempt to forfeit a charter in the United States. The cases which have occurred in England, whence we so often draw our legal authorities, are extremely vague and unsatisfactory. They were proceedings in times of great trouble and confusion, when the law was unsettled or little understood, and when the justice of the case, or the rights of the parties, were as little regarded. In most instances they originated in the ambition of the Crown, or in its hostility to the particular corporation whose dissolution was desired; and were mostly made by judges either corrupted or overawed by the power and influence of the Crown. The principles upon which a charter would be decreed forfeited on one day, in a short time afterwards would be reprobated by Parliament, and the franchise restored, as the political temper of the times happened to predominate. They do not, therefore, partake of the stability of other decisions; and, valuing as we do the freedom of our institutions, and the certainty of our laws, are entitled to no credit in our country. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has referred us to the famous case of the city of London, in the reign of Charles II, as the source whence he draws his learning and his principles upon this subject. But his friend must have forgotten the character of that case, and the circumstances under which the decision was made. It is a case from which little purity of doctrine can be extracted. It occurred in the time of a prince of a very unsettled character, and of a lawless ambition; of whom it has been observed, "that he never said a foolish thing, or did a wise one;" and in the path of whose tyranny and ambition the laws interposed no barrier. The proceedings against the city of London were the result of the political ambition of the Crown; and "the head and front of the offending" was a libel on the King. In that case, too, even in England, it was then made a question whether a charter could be forfeited, no decision having previously been made, and though it was decided affirmatively, and the forfeiture actually decreed, yet, afterwards, when the feeling in which the persecution originated had subsided, Parliament restored the charter, because it had been unjustly forfeited. The historians of those events, associating the judges of that day with this transaction, and who, holding their commissions at the pleasure of the Crown, were generally the instruments of its tyranny, stamp them with a corrupt devotion to the views of the Court, regardless alike of the rights of property, and of human life. If, however, this case of the city of London could be referred to, it would prove nothing for the argument; since it is uncertain whether the being of the corporation ever was absolutely forfeited. On the contrary, it may be inferred, from the records of those proceedings, that it still subsisted, and that the seizure was a seizure only of the Mayoralty, notwithstanding which the citizens exercised all their corporate rights, except that of choosing their own Mayor. It may be observed also, that in this, as in all the other cases in England, that they were generally cases of incorporated towns; and the acts complained of as working a forfeiture, were acts of oppression upon third persons, not members of the corporation, and in violation of the positive laws of the land; rather the assumption of new powers, than the irregular exercise of powers clearly granted by their charters.

Under all these circumstances, Mr. McLANE said, the only safety and sound principles were to be drawn from the charter of our own institutions, from the nature of the grant, from the nature of these artificial persons as created by the acts of Congress, and the great ends which the aggregate of their component parts was designed to accomplish. Admitting, therefore, said he, that the charter of a corporation may be forfeited, by acts of mis-user or non-user; he contended that they must be corporate acts, and amount to a breach of the condition upon which the corporation was created, by rendering the corporation incapable of acting in its corporate capacity, and of performing the objects of its incorporation. All acts of mis-user or of non-user, less than such as he here referred to, were to be corrected by the visitatorial power, where it exists, or by milder means than the destruction of the being of the incorporation. If a corporation neglect or refuse to appoint officers, through whom only it can act, and where no provision is made for such an event, it might thus be rendered incapable of performing its functions, though in England this is now declared to be no cause of forfeiture; but, if after it elects its officers they misbehave, though in a degree not subversive of the great ends of the incorporation, their misconduct may be corrected, but there can be no forfeiture, for this reason, of the charter. As in the natural, so in the legal or artificial person, the entire annihilation of its being is considered a desperate remedy, never to be resorted to until all efforts to reform, by milder means, have proved abortive. The corporation must be wholly unable, either by utter incapacity, or by a total subversion of all its faculties, from complying with the condition of its existence, or from performing its functions in the community; and the objects of its institution must be altogether unattainable, before its complete dissolution can be decreed. The acts of mis-user should lead to the same result, and be productive of the same incapacity, as those of non-user, in order to furnish a ground of forfeiture, and before its being can be destroyed.

Mr. McL. said there was a wide distinction between the condition of the charter and the numerous provisions generally contained in it, designed to enable the corporation the better to comply with the condition. These latter are often made for the benefit of the corporators, and to furnish them with the means of their own government; and though it would always be proper to conform to them, yet for a departure from some of them, if in doing so the great ends of the institution are not defeated, and its capacity to comply with its condition not impaired, there cannot, in the nature of the case, be a forfeiture. They are to be corrected by the visitatorial power. The very existence of a visitatorial power evinces the truth of this doctrine. There would be no occasion for this power if every violation of any provision in a charter incurred a forfeiture of its being. If such a violation would incur a forfeiture there would be no safety or stability in any corporation. Different men may take different views of the same provision. There may be many acts of the officers of the institution of which the corporators could have no knowledge, and equally opposed to their interests and those of the public. They may refuse to a man an office to which he is entitled by the provisions of the charter. He may apply to be restored, but it would be a singular remedy to annihilate the charter, and, with it, the office. The directors may lend money to a man professedly insolvent, and should be liable for the debt, and corrected for the misconduct; but it would be a fatal specific to destroy the whole being of the corporation, and involve the stockholders in greater ruin for this irregularity. In all such cases, the visitatorial power in England, by means of a mandamus from the Court of King's Bench, applies the remedy; and where this remedy is effectual the work of destruction is never resorted to.

The act of violation, said Mr. McL., must not only amount to a breach of the condition, but it must be the act of the corporation; and, if practised by the officers, must be an official corporate act. Innocent stockholders should not be answerable for the misconduct of their officers, unless within the limit of their authority. If an individual director improperly avails himself of his public condition to promote his private speculations, it is not such an act of official abuse for which the corporators would be liable, or for which the charter would be forfeited; and therefore, all the improper conduct of some of the individuals who have been directors in this institution; and which has fallen under the severe animadversion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) are not such acts as would work a forfeiture. They are acts which I do not mean to justify or excuse—which I will unite with the other members of the committee in visiting with the severest reprehension. But they are the acts of these individuals alone, in which the rest of the committee had no share—of which they had no knowledge until the committee exposed them, and for which, they are, therefore, in no degree culpable. Punish the individuals concerned in them, if you please, but do not involve in indiscriminate destruction the innocent and the guilty.

Mr. McL. said, if these principles were correct, a more particular examination of the acts of violation reported by the committee would show that no forfeiture had been incurred. The first act of violation was the purchase of two millions of the public debt for the Government of the United States. Mr. McL. had never believed that this act afforded the slightest ground for a forfeiture, if it could be supposed any violation at all. The provision in the charter could have designed nothing more than to prevent the bank from purchasing stock with a view to become the owner of it. It was intended, as had already been remarked by the gentleman from South Carolina, to prevent the bank from going into market in competition with the Government. In purchasing this stock they did not mean to hold it; they bought for the Government of the United States, under an arrangement made with the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury insisted upon the right to redeem this amount of stock, which the bank legally sold. Mr. McL. believed the Secretary was wrong; but, be this as it may, the bank, to avoid difficulty, purchased so much stock for the use of the Government. They were, at no period, the absolute owners of the stock. They were the trustees of the United States, under the arrangement, from the moment of the purchase; and, by a transfer to the Government completed the transaction. It was a losing bargain for the bank, and the Government was censurable on this account. But, Mr. McL. inquired with what face he could now insist upon a forfeiture for this act, committed for the interest of the Government, and forced upon the corporation by Government? He could not suppose it necessary to expend more time upon this part of the subject.

The second act of violation was that of discounting for the coin part of the second and third instalments. Mr. McL. said he would not consume the time of the Committee in an inquiry into the policy or impropriety of the measure. He would content himself with remarking that, in his opinion, it was unnecessary. He believed it would have been better for the institution if it had gone into operation upon the amount of the subscriptions. Its progress, perhaps, would have been slower, but, he believed, surer, in the end; and it would have prevented those speculations in the stock of which so much complaint had been made. Those who had the management of the institution, however, and who understood all its springs, thought differently, and their opinion was certainly entitled to some weight; and whether it were wise or unwise, if they possessed the right to do so, and if in doing so they did not defeat the great ends of the institution, and break the condition of the charter, it is no forfeiture.

Gentlemen are in an error in supposing that this provision was the great condition of the charter; it is only a provision, and an important one truly, to promote the performance of the condition. The subscribers to the bank are incorporated, and invested with the right to carry on the operations of banking; to lend money and issue notes; and the fundamental condition of this grant is, that they shall at all times pay specie for the notes thus issued, upon demand; that they shall pay a certain sum to the Government, and make loans to a certain amount, and furnish other facilities enumerated in the charter, and not violate any of the laws of the country. The motives of policy which recommended the charter, form no part of the condition. The particular provision alluded to, therefore, was not designed so much to constitute a condition of the charter as to create an obligation in the stockholders to pay up the amount of their subscriptions, and to designate the time at which the corporation would have the right to make the demand. This is evident from the penalty being imposed on the delinquent stockholder for non-payment. There is no penalty imposed upon the corporation for not enforcing payment in case of delinquencies. If any individual stockholder had neglected or refused to pay his instalment at the time it became due, it will scarcely be contended that he would have forfeited his corporate rights, and have been liable to be removed, as a corporator. The corporation might have brought suit, and withheld the dividends until payment was made; but the individual would still have continued a member of the corporation. If, then, the neglecting to pay by the stockholder would not have forfeited his membership under this charter, the neglect on the part of a majority would not have had a greater effect; much less would the forbearance, on the part of the directors, to sue in case of a delinquency, or even their aiding the payment, work a forfeiture of the charter, and dissolve the being of the corporation. It is by such a course of reasoning that the right of forfeiture is inferred: for it was said, in the case of the prosecution against the city of London, before adverted to, "that, as every member may forfeit that which any member may, the same acts which will forfeit the right of every member, separately considered, if done jointly by all the members, will have the same effect, or, in other words, will be a forfeiture of the existence of the whole corporation."

If, then, this charter did not mean to forfeit the right of any one member, for the non-payment of his instalment, as I contend it did not, neither did it design to forfeit the existence of the whole corporation, if all the members neglected. But, sir, said Mr. McL., the bank was authorized to go into operation after the subscriptions should be completed, and before the second instalment became due; and the second instalment could not, therefore, have been considered as necessary to its operations. In giving this authority, the charter must have authorized all its consequences. The bank did go into operation in the manner and at the time prescribed by the charter. Being legally in operation, it had the legal right to discount and lend money to whomsoever it pleased, and to any amount, taking the risk of the penalties imposed by the charter. If the directors exercised this right indiscreetly, they violated their trust to the stockholders, but the incorporation incurred no forfeiture. Suppose, sir, that, without passing any of the resolutions referred to in the report, they had gone on to discount, no one would censure them for discounting to stockholders, on a pledge of stock. For my own part, I am free to declare, that I think loans on stock, if not disproportionate in relation to the wants and business of the rest of the community, are the safest and best; nor would they have deserved censure if they had given a preference to the stockholders, which, in fact, would be the necessary consequence of giving preference to stock loans, as the discounting to stockholders was the necessary effect of lending on stock security at all; neither could it have been incumbent upon the directors, or proper for them, to inquire into the application of the proceeds of the discounts. If, then, they had discounted to stockholders, which would have been both legal and proper, the persons obtaining the loans would have drawn out the notes of the bank; with these notes they would also have drawn the specie, and then returned it back in payment of the instalments. Such an operation would have been payment; by such an operation the individual stockholder would have complied with his engagement, aided, it is true, by the bank; but, in the exercise of a legal right—the right of lending money, and discounting in the regular course of banking operations—no other effect is produced by the discounts under the resolution. If it were not illegal to discount to a stockholder, and suffer the application of the proceeds to be made in payment of the instalment, which could not have been prevented without a resolution, he was at a loss to conceive how a resolution to discount could create the illegality. One distinction is, that, instead of resolving to discount at the time the paper is offered, the resolution is made before any application for discount is preferred, and the object honestly avowed. Another distinction is, that the discounter, instead of drawing the specie, merely for form sake, leaves it in the bank to his credit; in effect, he has deposited so much specie, and his bank book is the certificate of the fact; but these are rather distinctions without a difference. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has admitted the correctness of this operation, in regard to the third instalment; and I cannot perceive any discrimination, in point of principle, between the third and the second. Mr. McL. said, it should here be remembered that this exercise of the legal right did not, in any degree, incapacitate the bank from performing all the great objects of its incorporation, whether as matters of condition or policy. It has at all times performed them in good faith; it is yet daily performing them. It has, in no instance, ever refused to pay its notes in specie, on demand; it has essentially contributed to the wants and enterprise of the community; it was enabled sooner to extend its operations, and diffuse its influence more widely, and to act with greater promptitude and more efficiently; it enabled the State banks to resume specie payments earlier than they otherwise would have done; it has never failed in any of its stipulations with the Government; but, on the contrary, has always furnished it with great and continued facilities. It was not certain, nor even probable, at the price specie then bore, that the withholding of the dividends from the delinquents would have compelled the prompt payment of the second instalment, and the right of suing afforded no greater means for this purpose. By the mode adopted, the operations of the bank were considerably quickened, the interest of the stockholders advanced, the public good promoted, and the means acquired of certainly compelling payment in the space of sixty days, by a mere sale of the stock. In point of fact, the arrangement was executed in good faith; and the investigation I have made, authorizes me to say that, with very few exceptions, and these to a small amount, payment was punctually made as the notes became due. My honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has insisted that the bank was bound to bring suit, and ought to have done so. But, sir, I deny that there was any such obligation; it would have been strange, indeed, if there had been, since the right to sue, and the propriety of exercising such right, involves considerations of great moment, which could not have been foreseen, and generally depend upon the state of things existing at the time the right accrues. If the penalty prescribed by the charter failed in its effects, there was no obligation to go farther; it became a matter of sound discretion with the directors, to adopt the course most consistent with the character of the bank and the state of the community; and if it appeared probable that the penalty would be ineffectual, it was the part of a wise and prudent foresight to anticipate and provide against the evils which might ensue. Suppose the bank, however, to have sued, and to have refused to discount to a stockholder, merely because he was such, (which is indeed a presumption at variance with the best notions on the subject,) would a different effect have been produced, or would the condition of the bank have been improved by the proceeding? The suits must have been commenced in various parts of the United States, wherever the delinquent stockholder happened to reside; in some a longer, in others perhaps a shorter time, but in none less than eighteen months would have been required to obtain judgment. The diversity of tribunals to which the bank would thus have been compelled to resort, would have increased the delay and expense, and multiplied difficulties without number; and, after all, there could have been no security in the uncertain and embarrassed state of things at that time, that, at the end of the race, the stockholder would have been solvent. In the meantime, it would have been the duty of the bank, with a faithful regard to the interests of the punctual stockholders, and the Government, and to the welfare of the community, to have made discounts and carried on its operations: by this means its notes must have gone into circulation, and judgment being obtained in the cases in which suits may be supposed to have been brought, the defendants would either have gone into court with the notes of the bank, and paid the judgment, or first drawn the specie, and then paid it, in discharge of the suit. The moment the bank went legally into operation, this result was inevitable; and I cannot perceive how the mode of exercising a legal right can be construed to work a forfeiture of the incorporation.

The third act of violation consists in paying dividends to stockholders who had not completed their instalments. The facts upon this point being correctly ascertained, there will be no occasion for little, if any argument in regard to it. It is in proof that, according to the regular course of business, "when a stockholder came to pay his instalment after the regular period, but before any dividend was declared, interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, was paid by him, on the amount of his second instalment from the 1st January, 1817, to the time of his paying up. If he came to pay his second instalment after the dividend was declared, viz., 7th July, 1817, the first dividend was considered as forfeited, and interest on his instalments was paid from the 1st July, 1817, to the time of his paying up." The general rule of business on this point, was, therefore, in strict conformity with the words of the charter, and the exceptions which have been pointed out, were rather in obedience to the sound spirit and intention of the provision, than a departure from the words. There were but four instances in which the rate was not strictly adhered to, and enforced: the shares of all the four amounted to three hundred and sixty-five; one was the case of a widow, holding but a few shares, and the others had been prevented from making punctual payment to some accidental circumstances, entitling them to a relaxation of the rule. The object of this provision in the charter, was clearly to compel the payment of the instalments, and, like all other human laws, designed to impose the penalty upon a wilful or corrupt negligence; so far as this was its object, it was executed strictly, and in good faith; but it could never have been intended to punish a failure upon the part of the unwary, or which was occasioned by accidents, over which the ordinary human exertion had no control; for such instances, in the very nature of the case, a discretion must have been vested in the great body of the stockholders. The provision was introduced, also, for the benefit of the punctual stockholders, and if they think proper to waive its benefit, and relax the rigor of the words in the case in which there existed no design to evade its provision, it cannot be a ground of complaint with any one else. They have waived it by their own act, and they do not desire any proceeding on this account. If, indeed, in point of strict law, this act could be considered as a violation of the provision, it could scarcely be deemed of sufficient magnitude to justify the widespread ruin which would ensue a forfeiture of the whole incorporation. The interest having been charged upon the shares until the payment of the instalments, the difference would be of little or no importance. It fully evinces that there could have been no evil design to violate the charter; and surely gentlemen will not contend that it in any degree embarrassed the operations of the bank in the attainment of the great and fundamental ends of the institution.

The fourth act of violation is said to consist in "the judges of the first and second elections allowing many persons to give more than thirty votes each, under the pretence of their being attorneys for others, in whose names the shares then stood."

Mr. McL. said he concurred with the unanimous sentiment of the committee in disapproving this act. It could not be disguised, that its effect was to enable the large speculator in stock to control the influence in the management and direction of the bank, to the exclusion of the small and bona fide stockholder. Yet he could not imagine that it would be deemed, under all the circumstances, a ground of forfeiture. He also begged leave here to remark, that the custom of subscribing for stock in the name of another, and voting as the attorney for that other, had been practised at all times and at all places, in this country, since the first organization of similar institutions, and that what had been universal custom and immemorial usage might almost be taken to be the common law of the case. It was a right, also, in which every subscriber might have participated. It does not appear very satisfactorily, from the proof, whether the practice was generally known or adopted, though it is certain that it was adopted by many of the large stockholders; but whether it was certainly known to others, or to what number, or to all the judges, or whether they were in possession of sufficient proof of the fact, does not appear. Mr. McL. asked, if, under these circumstances, it was clear that the persons in whose name the stock was so held had not the legal right to vote, or that the judges could have rejected the votes, or compelled a consolidation? He believed not. By the charter, the number of votes to which the stockholders shall be entitled, shall be according to the number of shares which he, she, or they, respectively, shall "hold;" the act of holding is adopted as the evidence of ownership, or, at least, as giving the right to vote. The person in whose name the stock stands is the holder; with him are all the legal rights and all the responsibilities. No other than the holder could vote upon the shares, and neither the commissioners nor the corporation possessed the power of compelling the transfer of the shares. Even if they had suspected the contrivance, they had no means of defeating it; they were bound to receive the best evidence, and the books of the commissioners were conclusive of the fact of holding. It could not, therefore, have been the misconduct of the judges of the election, since they were unauthorized to act otherwise, and since it would have been impracticable for them to detect the collusion which was supposed to have been practised between the "holder" and the attorney. For this reason, it therefore follows, that the manner of voting complained of was not a corporate act; it was not an abuse by the corporation, but the mere misbehaviour of a few of the individual stockholders, for their own private purposes—misbehaviour, either unknown to the great body of the stockholders, or over which they had no control. It surely will not be contended, that the misconduct of one or more of the stockholders, unauthorized and unofficial, is to destroy the rights of all the others, who are innocent men, and alone injured by the misbehaviour. If it were a violation of the charter, it was a violation by those individuals by whom it was practised; it might be proper to punish them, but it would be worse than injustice to involve others in a common fate! Perhaps, too, if the votes thus given were necessary to the election of the successful candidates, their election might have been declared void; but this would have been the extent of the operation upon the being of the incorporation. Mr. McL. also contended, that this provision in the charter was introduced for the benefit of the individual stockholders, and principally for the small stockholders: these were chiefly, if not solely, interested in its faithful performance; and we have not heard that they would desire a remedy, if it could be so called, which would annihilate at a blow the whole of their interests. The Government have no interest in the election; their stock is represented by their own directors, appointed by their own authority, without the consent or knowledge of the other stockholders; and it is worthy of constant remembrance, in considering this subject, that those by whom this particular violation was principally practised, and to whom the most of the evils and abuses which grow out of it have been attributed, were the directors appointed by the Government, and, with the power of removal in their hands, retained by the Government, from time to time, until the recent exposition in the report of the committee.

In short, then, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., all the acts complained of as violations of the charter consist, at most, in either an unwise or improper exercise of a legal right, or in the acts or misconduct of individuals, for which the incorporation cannot be officially responsible: they have in no degree defeated the great ends of the institution, or impaired its capacity to perform and discharge all its principal functions. It is yet in full life and vigor; shaken a little, perhaps, by our treatment to it, by our jealousies and suspicions, and reproaches, but, containing a sound constitution and abundant means of usefulness, would be capable, with a few wholesome corrections, of answering all our reasonable expectations. Under such circumstances, it would be difficult to find a motive sufficient to justify its unnatural and premature dissolution.

Mr. McL. said that he had intended, when he rose, to have entered into a consideration of the different acts of abuse and misconduct to which the report of the committee had alluded, though not amounting to a violation of the charter; but he felt, if he did so, he should exhaust himself and the Committee before he could submit all the remarks which the course he had prescribed to himself rendered necessary. Upon this part of the subject, he would, therefore, briefly remark, that, besides the improper speculations in stock, of which he had already spoken, the abuses which had fallen under the animadversion of the report might be comprehended under six general heads: 1. The conduct of the Bank of the United States towards the State institutions. 2. The practice of selling drafts on its offices. 3. Discounting on a pledge of stock. 4. The arrangement for paying the dividends in Europe. 5. The improper rejection of business paper; and, 6. Allowing discounts to be made by the president and cashier. As to the second and fourth of these acts, which had been the most condemned, Mr. McL. said no doubt could be entertained that the bank had the right to do both; and he did not think we should interfere with its exercise, unless some manifest and serious injury was likely to result to the public; even then we could do little more than withdraw the public deposits. He had yet seen no such evil flowing from these measures. The selling drafts upon its offices was a mere exchange operation, of great public convenience and accommodation, contributing essential facilities to the commercial enterprise of the country and the financial concerns of the nation. There had been no instance, within his knowledge, in which it had been exercised oppressively or improperly; in the nature of things, it could not be, since it was optional with the individual to make his own bargain. The arrangement for paying the dividends in Europe could never be used to the prejudice of the stockholder or the public. He saw no impropriety in giving to the stock its highest credit in the European market; and it was a matter involving so many considerations, connected with all our commercial and political relations abroad, that he felt entirely satisfied to rest it with the discretion of gentlemen who were daily and intimately conversant with all their details. He was sure that the arrangement would be continued no longer than was consistent with the interest and profit of the institution. Of the third head, he not only believed the bank had the perfect right to discount on a pledge of stock, but he was inclined to think it was the safest and best mode of doing business, if it were not practised to the injury of the commercial activity and general enterprise of the country. Of this, he believed the directors, from their local knowledge, would always have the best means of judging; and the investigation he had made afforded him no reason to believe that either of these effects had yet been produced. He would not refrain, however, from condemning the practice of discounting upon a pledge of stock above its par value, and of dispensing with the personal security, under the power of substitution. Equally reprehensible, in his opinion, was the practice of permitting the president and cashier to make loans without the approbation of the directors, in each particular case. He believed it was calculated to lead to serious abuses; and he trusted to the good sense of the stockholders to correct it. As it regarded the conduct of the Bank of the United States towards State institutions, he could not imagine that it would afford any ground of complaint. It had undoubtedly been mild, generous, and conciliatory; and it was with surprise he had heard his honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) maintain that it had not facilitated their resumption of specie payments. Sir, this was among the first and great benefits which this institution diffused throughout the community, and the documents show that its desire to accomplish this end led to the adoption of some of those very acts upon which censure has since fallen, and created difficulties with which it would otherwise not have struggled. It accomplished this desirable end in your cities, by large and liberal loans to the State banks, and by giving currency to their paper, thus shielding the individual debtors from an undue and fatal pressure, and enabling the banks, without their aid, to meet all their engagements. It enabled all the country banks, and especially those in the interior and to the westward, to do so, by receiving from the Government an immense amount of the country bank notes, which could not have been redeemed as early as the public necessities required, and gave to the banks a liberal time for their redemption; thus throwing into circulation a large amount of good paper, supplying the wants of the Treasury, and relieving the State banks from the pressure from which they had everything to apprehend.

But, sir, said Mr. McL., it is inconsistent with my present design to pursue this part of the subject further. I have already said, that I do not stand here as the indiscriminate defender of the bank. The inquiry which I deem material to pursue is, whether the abuses which have been practised and really do exist, will not admit of a perfect correction without the destruction of the being of the incorporation? If they will, I will never consent to be among its destroyers. It would be unbecoming in us to wield our power vindictively, when a chastening arm would answer every good purpose. That all these acts of misconduct will admit of correction by mild means, and will, in fact, be corrected without much interference on our part, is to me perfectly clear. The most serious acts of abuse, those in which it is alleged are involved the violations of charter, are already corrected—they exist no longer. There is no apprehension that the bank will ever repeat the purchase of any part of the public debt; it has suffered too sorely in the past instance, to yield so ready an acquiescence in the instructions of the Treasury in future. The loans on account of the instalments have principally been paid, and cannot, in the nature of things, ever recur. And the same remark may be made in relation to the payment of the dividends to the delinquent stockholders. As it regards the division of the votes, the documents furnished by the committee show that all the stock has long since been consolidated; but, if it should be otherwise, the bill reported by the committee will compel it to be done, and effectually prevent a recurrence of the evil. Those scenes of speculation also, of which so much has been said, must very soon cease, if they have not ceased already. They are more or less incident to the inception of all such institutions, and cannot be prevented. Men will subscribe for and purchase stock on speculation; the only remedy is to be found in the regular march of the institution. Under a sound management and a prudent disposition of its means, the large speculator will soon lose his power of controlling the market; the affairs of the institution will acquire stability; its stock will reach a regular sound value, liable only to the inevitable fluctuations of ordinary property, and finally become vested in the hands of the solid capitalist. For the correction of all these abuses, we also have a pledge in the interest of the stockholders. A safer one could not be provided. They are well acquainted with their interests, and, if they perceive a course of conduct calculated to prejudice them, they will not fail to check it, and promptly apply the remedy. If this has not been the case heretofore, it is because the great body of stockholders, in common with us, were ignorant of the nature or existence of the abuses. Besides, if this were a cause of complaint, the Government would come in for a large share. Their directors were the principal actors in the drama, and they possessed the power of removal at any time. We cannot doubt that the stockholders, with a due regard to their private interests, will confide their management to men no longer than they prove themselves to be worthy of the trust. There is also, in the very nature of the exposure which the report has made, an ample remedy for all the evils; the scrutinizing power of Congress has already been felt; that it will be exercised, is no longer a matter of speculation; and these facts, together with the nature of the report arising out of the recent investigation, will necessarily inculcate and preserve a due circumspection of conduct in future. Of all this, we need no better proof than is to be found in the effects already produced by the late inquiry. We have already seen the unfortunate man who presided over this institution, surrendering a lucrative post the moment it was intimated that he had abused the trust confided to him. I call this gentleman unfortunate, because I believe his misfortunes are attributable to the influence of others, much more than to any immoral propensity in his own breast. And we have further seen his example followed by another, against whom the animadversions of the report have been principally directed. The same spirit, in obedience to which these sacrifices have been made, will not falter in its course until an entire reform has been effected.

But, Mr. McL. said, there were other reasons why these abuses would not continue. They were not the result of any general unsoundness in the management of the institution. My honorable colleagues, said Mr. McL., will, I am sure, justify me in saying, that there were men in the direction, the example of whose general conduct individually and officially any one might proudly imitate. Men of highminded honorable feelings and sound intelligence, capable of conducting the institution with credit to themselves and benefit to the public, and to whom no sinister motive or unfair conduct could be imputed—who had, on all occasions, been the advocates of an enlightened, disinterested policy, and had resigned considerable emolument, which they might honorably have made, rather than incur the suspicion of participating in the smallest degree in those stock speculations which have been so much reprobated. In the number of these men, besides those named in the report, Mr. McL. said it afforded him great pleasure to enumerate Mr. T. Willing and Mr. Fisher, of Philadelphia, and his honorable friend in this House, from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) as conspicuous for the qualifications he had mentioned. On the whole, he concluded that there was every reason to calculate upon a safe and discreet management of the affairs of the bank in future, superintended, as it would be, by the inquisitorial power of Congress, and the control of the Treasury over the public deposits.

In regard to the question of the expediency of abrogating their charter, Mr. McL. said, if his construction of the acts of violation were correct, it would be very unnecessary to enter into a consideration of it, since, if there were no forfeiture, the charter would be beyond our power. Nor would he go so much into detail upon this part of the subject, because of the length of time he had already occupied, and the danger of encroaching upon the views taken by the gentleman from South Carolina. Without detaining the Committee, therefore, said Mr. McL., in particularly considering the importance of this institution, in providing a circulating medium, in averting the evils of a depreciated paper currency, in equalizing the exchange in the different parts of this extensive country in the eminent degree it has done, in facilitating the financial operations of the Government, in providing a ready medium for their revenue, and safety for their deposits, and in inspiring life and activity into the commercial enterprise of the community, I will remark merely, that all the reasons that so powerfully recommended the creation of the bank yet exist, in all their vigor, to recommend its preservation. Among these, the most important, in my view, is the necessity of a national currency, beyond the reach of local interests and commercial fluctuations; and the inexpediency of relying upon State banks, for the national wants and the operations of our public finances. Not merely as it respects the supplying of the Government and its debtors with a sound unvarying medium, considerations suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, but as it regards the stability of the Government and the efficiency of all its measures in war and in peace. I ask, sir, if it is wise to place the pecuniary resources of the National Government at the control of State banks? If we consider for a moment the vast extent of our continent, from all quarters whereof our revenue is to be drawn, and over all parts of which the supreme arm of the General Government is to be extended, in the regulation of commerce and providing for the common defence and general welfare; if we consider also the augmenting concerns which are daily multiplying with the growth of this mighty empire, and the almost absolute necessity of banking facilities for the effectual exercise of all the powers intrusted to the Federal Government, the folly of placing our reliance on State institutions will be manifest. Their charters might expire, and their existence cease at the very moment their aid would be the most necessary. I invite gentlemen to reflect also upon their power and influence over the moneyed affairs of the community. It is in their power to render worthless any medium which the Government may be compelled to create, excepting the metals, of which we all know the scarcity is greatest in times of the most pressing necessity. Such a power, in the hands of that diversity of interests, which might prevail in the different States of this Union, might paralyze the national arm and have a fatal influence upon our prosperity. I ask gentlemen to recur to the experience of the late war. Then all these calamities were seriously felt. We must all remember the embarrassments of the Government at that time. Then the State banks, in most instances, refused their aid, and the very necessities of the Government forfeited individual confidence.—Treasury notes were resorted to, and every effort was made to give them currency—the faith of the nation was pledged for their redemption, and they were made receivable for public debts, but the State banks refused to receive them in deposits; and by this single act depressed them to ten, and in some instances to fifteen per cent. below par. The consequence was unavoidable; the national arm was weakened, its resources crippled, and its credit annihilated. To prevent a recurrence of similar calamities, the present bank was incorporated, and I admonish gentlemen to beware how they leave us exposed once more to evils of the same character.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. McL., there are additional reasons now, which recommend the protection of the bank, that did not exist at the time it was incorporated. By giving this institution a being and existence, you have created innumerable rights which did not before exist. There are the debtors and creditors of the bank who have connected their interests with it on the faith of the nation, and would be ruined by its sudden destruction. There are, also, the innocent stockholders, here and abroad, who have invested their fortunes in the institution upon the same national faith, and upon the reasonable presumption, that no harsher measures would be adopted towards it than what experience had justified in regard to others. Of the foreign stockholder, this national faith is the chief reliance, for, in effect, not being allowed to vote by proxy, his interest can scarcely be said to be represented. It is the interest of the Government to preserve its own and the credit of the stock in Europe, and this cannot be done without giving it security and stability in their estimation. If it be once discerned that the existence of such an institution is dependent upon legislative caprice or local interests your stocks will soon be looked upon with distrust and jealousy. If anything could add strength to these considerations, it is, that the act of violation, upon which a forfeiture is mainly supported, has already received an amnesty at your hands. Two years ago it was officially announced to you—an investigation of the matter was made—the subject was brought before Congress, and it was finally resolved to be inexpedient to take any further notice of it. By this vote, others than those who at that time held stock were encouraged to become purchasers. It was an announcement to the world, that Congress would sustain the bank, notwithstanding this act of violation; hundreds of our citizens, upon this principle, purchased the stock at extravagant prices, and, after all this, to recall this act from its grave and seize upon it for the purpose of immolating the institution, would be an act of which, for the glory of the nation, I trust it will never be guilty.

But the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Tyler) had said, and he thought with more beauty than force, that this act was committed when the child was in its infancy, and if we then overlooked it, as the folly of the infant, it is the more necessary now to punish the aberrations of its manhood. Mr. McL. said, it was a new system of discipline to visit on the head of the man the follies of the boy, and was unreasonable as well in the artificial as in the natural person. Sir, said Mr. McL., I have no sort of objection that you shall consider this institution as your child; in fact it is so, and, if properly cherished, one that will not dishonor its parent. I only desire that you shall exercise towards him a parental solicitude and authority; if he prove refractory, admonish him; if it be necessary to prevent him from doing an injury to you and himself, administer wholesome correction; but do not act the part of an unnatural parent, and not only torture, but sacrifice him for faults which you have once overlooked, or for future acts of misconduct, which may in some degree be ascribed to your own improper indulgence.

Mr. McL. said, that he had already consumed so much time that he would conclude with an apology to the Committee for trespassing so long upon their patience, and with thanking them for their attention.

Mr. SERGEANT addressed the Chair, as follows: Mr. Chairman, I beg the permission of the Committee, to offer to them some observations upon the several propositions that are now submitted for their consideration and decision.

The inquiry in which we are engaged is attended with some intrinsic difficulties, of no inconsiderable magnitude, and calculated very much to embarrass our deliberations, as they must have been to embarrass the deliberations of the select committee, to whom the examination of this subject was more particularly confided. In the first place, it is retrospective, and I admit it is necessarily so. We are called upon to take a review of the management and conduct of the bank during all the period of its existence, and we expect to find that the best has been done in every instance, which, with the full light derived from a knowledge of all that has since happened, appears to us to have been possible. In this manner it is, that battles are fought over again in discussion; and, whether they have been lost, or whether they have been won, it seldom happens that those who thus sit in judgment upon them cannot detect some errors that have been committed—point out advantages that have been lost, and opportunities that have been suffered to pass unimproved. The just rule of judgment in such cases, if, indeed, its application were practicable, would be to place ourselves in the situation of those upon whose conduct we are called to pass, in the midst of the difficulties by which they were surrounded, and with no better view of the future than what their own judgment could afford them.

It is in the nature, too, of this inquiry, conducted as it has been, to group and connect together all the exceptionable acts that have been done by those to whom the management of the institution has been confided; while, to use a bank phrase, it gives no credit for those things which were right, and even entitled to some commendation. I wish, sir, to be distinctly understood: I am not using the language either of complaint or censure. I only say, that, as the inquiry, from its nature, was in a great measure confined to exceptionable acts, it must necessarily present them in a body, without relief from their association with the mass of good deeds with which, in their order, they stood connected. This is a sort of judgment which none of us would be willing to submit to, or could expect to endure. Let the life of any man, the most honest and honorable, be exposed to the same kind of examination. Begin with his infancy, (to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia,) and follow him through the different periods of his progress, put together, as constituting his history, whatever, from the severest scrutiny, you can find, that has deserved reproach or censure. What a dark exhibition would it be!

Besides, sir, what is at last the test we apply? We set opinion against opinion, upon a subject of a very comprehensive and of a very complicated nature, involving much detail, and every detail involving more or less of speculative inquiry.

There are extrinsic difficulties, of no less magnitude. It cannot be denied that there has been a vast deal of prejudice in the public mind, against this institution, which, whatever may be our resolutions to the contrary, affects us insensibly, and, when we neither know nor suspect it. The sources of this prejudice are sufficiently apparent.

The State institutions have many of them been induced to regard the National Bank as an enemy, and the spirit of hostility which they have felt has had a most powerful influence throughout the community, with which they are so extensively and intimately connected. It is in the ordinary course, too, of the operations of the bank, to give frequent offence to individuals. Every man who is refused a discount thinks himself aggrieved, and indulges a feeling of resentment, not at all mitigated by any consideration of the circumstances that may have rendered it prudent, or even necessary, to reject his application. The same remark might be made, with equal truth, of every sort of accommodation which the bank is supposed to have the capacity to afford, but which events, beyond its power to control, do frequently oblige it to withhold. When the directors, not very long ago, exercising a right that no one denies to have belonged to them, and exercising it under the compulsion of circumstances so imperious, that every one now confesses they could not have refrained without a plain violation of their duty; when, I say, they determined that branch notes should thenceforth be paid only where, upon their face, they were made payable, there was an almost universal clamor. Sir, there is still another source of prejudice. The bank has had the day of its beginning. It is now in the day of its humiliation. But, it has had the day of its prosperity, too—when success, even beyond the expectations of its most sanguine friends, seemed to crown its operations. In that day—I appeal to many who are within hearing what I state, and are able to confirm its truth, as a mere matter of fact; I appeal to every one acquainted with our nature, to say whether it is not what would generally happen—those who had themselves refused to subscribe, and discouraged the subscription of others; those who had thus neglected to avail themselves of what then appeared to have been the golden opportunity, suffered all the mortification of seeing their predictions continually falsified, and could scarcely avoid the influence of a certain deeply implanted kindred feeling, which is never more sharply exerted than when we see others profit by what we have permitted to escape from ourselves. They did not avoid it.

There are, besides, many who think that a National Bank, however organized, is impolitic and unwise; and there are some who think it not within the Constitutional power of Congress to establish a bank.

Under the combined operation of such a mass of causes, the committee had no doubt a difficult task to perform, even if they had taken much more time for its performance than seems to have been allotted. If they have fallen into errors, it is not surprising; but it ought to secure from them some indulgence for errors in others. It will at least entitle us to differ from them in opinion, and freely and fully to canvass the grounds of the report.

Before, however, I proceed to examine the report, I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to the authority under which we have been acting, as it is to be found in the law for incorporating the subscribers to the bank. The provisions of the charter, designed to secure the faithful administration of the bank, contain in them a distribution of powers, just in itself, and perfectly well adapted to attain the object. The power given to this House, (sec. 23,) is confined to a single point of inquiry, whether or not the charter has been violated, in order that we may be enabled to judge whether or not it is expedient to institute legal proceedings for its repeal. The examination we are authorized to make, is subordinate to this object; and, to my mind, it is quite clear that we have no right to pursue it further. The care of the remaining interests of the Government in the institution is confided to the Executive. The President appoints the Government directors. The Secretary of the Treasury has an almost unlimited power of examining the proceedings of the bank. Weekly statements are to be made to him, (sec. 11, art. 15,) and he has the right to inspect everything except the accounts of individuals. The purpose is manifest: it is, in the first place, to enable him to judge of the conduct of the directors appointed by the Government. It is, in the next place, to enable him to decide whether the public interest in the bank, consisting of the stock belonging to the Government, and the deposits of public money, are faithfully guarded. The necessary sanction for enforcing the exercise of this power, is also confided to the Executive. The President has authority to appoint, and to him is given the authority to remove, the directors on the part of the Government, (sec. 8.) A much more important sanction is the power given to the Secretary of the Treasury, by section sixteen, to withdraw the public deposits, laying before Congress his reasons for so doing. The interests of the stockholders, which form the remaining branch of this great national concern, were intended to be left to the care of the stockholders themselves, as their best and safest guardians—their natural guardians; and it is the right of the stockholders to delegate the authority to such directors as they may think proper. This right is enforced and secured by the power of election. Their servants are accountable to them, precisely as we are to our constituents. If, upon a review of our conduct here, they are not satisfied with our efforts to serve them, they elect us no more, but devolve the honorable trust of representing them in the councils of the nation, upon others, whom they think more worthy of their confidence.

These provisions, thus arranged and distributed, are of sufficient efficacy for all the purposes that were designed to be accomplished. Thus arranged and distributed, they are in harmony with each other; and, while every interest is guarded by its appropriate sanction, they all co-operate to secure the common result—a faithful administration of the bank.

If this be a correct exposition of the terms of the charter, our inquiry ought, properly, only to be, what alone it can be effectually, whether the charter has been violated. Any other course will inevitably lead us into difficulty. If we undertake to examine the general administration of the affairs of the bank, or to investigate the conduct of particular directors, we are involved at once in the danger of an interference with the Executive. To that department it belongs to decide whether the public duty has been performed. The officer at the head of the Treasury must always be well qualified to decide. None but a citizen of distinguished talents will be placed in that high and responsible station; and, when there, his official occupations, the habitual tenor of his studies and reflections—his daily acquaintance with the management of the bank, in all its relations to the fiscal concerns of the nation, as well as his repeated inspection of the statements exhibited, will enable him, better than any other person, to judge how far its concerns are faithfully administered towards the public. Are we not in danger, too, of involving ourselves in collision with the Judiciary? We are here entertaining a mixed inquiry, partly of expediency and partly of charter right, mingled in such a way that, in deciding whether the charter has been violated, we make no distinction between errors, or, if you please, misconduct, in the management, and such offences of the corporation as would work a forfeiture of the charter. Indeed, the distinction, obvious as it is, seems scarcely to have been noticed, either in the report of the committee, or in the debate that has taken place. The great stress of objection has rested, not so much upon the specific violations of the charter, alleged to have been committed, as upon the more comprehensive ground of mismanagement in the exercise of indisputable charter-rights. Suppose, then, that, under the impression of considerations like these, you send this corporation to the Judiciary, there to receive its trial; you may send it there with all the weight of prejudice arising from a vote of Congress; you may, and you will, in some degree, pre-occupy the public mind, always deeply affected by the judgments of their representatives; and you may, and probably will, more or less impair the chance of a fair and impartial trial. But, when this trial shall come; when the corporation shall appear at the bar of a judicial tribunal, there will be an end to every question except the naked question of forfeiture; there will be an end to every consideration that is foreign to that precise inquiry, and then the consequence will be, that, following a different rule of judgment, the judicial tribunal will probably arrive at a different result. You are thus in direct collision. Different departments of the Government are placed in a state of hostility towards each other, the public mind is irritated, and that harmony which we all know to be of so much importance in the structure of our Government, is uselessly endangered.

Sir, we interfere, to a most alarming extent, with the just power of the stockholders. They are the exclusive judges of whom they will have for directors. They are the best judges. That sure instinct, "that keen, steady, and, as it were, magnetic sense of their own interest," which every man feels and obeys, in his own concerns, is the best security to be relied upon for a careful and prudent selection. It is the right of the stockholders, by the charter, and it is almost the only right they have reserved. To the Government they have conceded much; for themselves they have retained only the power in question, to be exercised under such modifications and restrictions as Congress thought fit to prescribe. Upon the faith of an undisturbed and free enjoyment of this republican right of choosing their own representatives, they have embarked their property in the institution; and would you, can you, without doing unjust violence to the compact you have made with them, impair or disturb the exercise of the power that belongs to them of judging for themselves whom they will have for directors? Sir, I will put to you what may, at this moment, perhaps, be deemed the strongest case. Suppose they choose to elect a broker, or a speculator—can you say they shall not? Have you the power to tell them what shall be the occupation, what the character of the men whom they are to employ? You may think their selection unwise or imprudent, but they will answer you that they know their own interests, and are able to take care of them. That, in the very instances you object to, though the individuals may be obnoxious to the imputation of being speculators or brokers, and you, on that general ground, may think them exceptionable, yet they, the stockholders, have the means of knowing their individual characters, from various sources inaccessible to you, and feel the fullest confidence in their intelligence and fidelity to the institution. I do not now touch the question of elections; it belongs to a different part of the inquiry.

I will make but one observation more upon this branch of the subject. It is essential to the interests of the stockholders, and it is no more than just to the directors that the latter should be free while they are performing the duties that are assigned to them; that they should be free, not only from all restraints except those to which the law subjects them, but that they should be free from the apprehension of an unlimited and undefined accountability. Many things are exclusively confided to them, and must be so confided. Their own judgment, fairly applied, their own discretion, is what must guide them. Who will undertake an office like this, if he is to act under the terror of an investigation that may put the worst construction upon well meant efforts; that may even expose his best acts to censure, and which, governed by no known rule in its course, and limited by no measure in its result, is calculated to confound all distinction between the officer and the individual, between error and misconduct, and, by a hasty sentence, to inflict the keenest punishment that an honorable man can endure? And this, too, upon what a member of the select committee has termed, and properly termed, an ex parte inquiry, where the accused has not an opportunity either of explanation or defence, and where the first notice he receives is in the heavy condemnation going forth against him, under the respected authority of a committee of this honorable House.

Sir, other objections will readily present themselves to such an inquiry. We have no rule or principle to direct us, no more than one man would have in judging whether another managed his estate to the greatest advantage. If the inquiry were simply whether the charter had been violated, we should have a comparatively easy duty. There might, and from what has occurred, I think it probable there would, be difference of opinion. Still, we should differ only about the application of established rules, and should be relieved from the most unpleasant part of the present inquiry.

But I know well that every public body, however constituted, listens with reluctance and with some displeasure to any argument or suggestion that tends to bring in question its own power. I do not mean, for it is no longer material, to question the power of this House in its immediate application to the business in hand. It is too late. Still less do I mean to avoid the full examination of all the grounds of complaint and censure that are displayed in the report of the committee. But I have thought it right to submit, with candor and freedom, such observations as occurred to me, upon the general nature of the authority possessed by this House, chiefly with a view to expose the mischiefs that might result from transcending it. Every member will allow to them weight as he thinks they deserve, and no more.

I will now proceed to consider the subject, under the two aspects in which it is presented by the committee.

I. As regards the general management of the institution.

II. As regards the alleged violations of the charter.

1. We all of us remember distinctly the state of things that existed when the law passed for incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States. We had a currency, or rather, to speak more accurately, we had currencies, local in their circulation, and variously depreciated in different parts of the Union; in some quarters of the country as much as twenty per cent. We had no general currency—none that would circulate freely everywhere. The evil effects were already very manifest, and threatened to increase. To say nothing of the obstructions and difficulties that were thrown in the way of domestic commerce and exchange, nor of the continual irritation that was occasioned by the changes in value that took place at every step, taken by what was called money in its progress, either with travellers or traders, through different parts of the Union—to say nothing of the effect upon the credit of the country—but passing these by as evils that were familiarly known and felt, there still remained one great source of grievance and public mischief which it peculiarly became the duty of the Government of the United States to endeavor to remove. The revenue of the Government was received in the paper of the State banks—its debts were paid in the same paper. What was the consequence? Its funds were not transferable from place to place, according to its wants, but confined in their use to the local limits which bounded the circulation of the paper in which they happened to be paid. There was nothing like uniformity in the payments made to the Government. A merchant in Boston, owing precisely the same nominal amount, paid twenty per cent. more than a merchant in Baltimore. There was the same inequality in the disbursement as in the receipt of the revenue. The public creditor, who had the good fortune to receive his money at Boston, received twenty per cent. more than the creditor who was obliged to receive it at Baltimore or Washington. In addition to all the inevitable evils that belong to such a state of things, (sufficient surely, if allowed to continue, to have endangered the well-being of the Union,) there was one, perhaps, also inseparably incident, that began to manifest itself. I allude, sir, to the power it gave to those who were intrusted with the collection and disbursement of the public moneys. They had the opportunity of benefiting themselves, and of favoring their friends, at the expense of the Treasury and at the expense of the public creditor. The very possibility of such an abuse was a sufficient ground of suspicion. At the period we are speaking of, an officer of the Government found it necessary to ask of this House an investigation of his conduct, in order that he might vindicate himself from certain injurious rumors circulated against him, upon no better foundation than that I have mentioned. The investigation took place; the result was satisfactory; and I refer to it only to bring into view one of the many kinds of mischief that grew out of the disordered condition of the currency. Whether the State institutions would of themselves have corrected the evil I do not think it necessary to inquire. The Government of the United States had no direct controlling power over them; and if they had so far sacrificed their own interests, in deference to the public good, as to restrict their business, and, of course, their profits, it must have been from a voluntary submission to motives of a higher character than ordinarily govern the conduct of individuals or bodies. But this I will say, that, if they were to be brought back by anything deserving the name of coercion, it could not have been by a gentler coercion than that which has been employed by the Bank of the United States. Sir, when this subject was before Congress, at the time of passing the act of incorporation, it was thought by many that the destruction of the State institutions would rapidly follow the establishment of a National Bank. I confess myself to have been one of those who were influenced by this apprehension. I thought the new institution would press heavily upon the old, and through them would press severely upon the community. I did not then see how the great public views were to be realized, without departing from that course of lenity towards the State banks which the interests of the community seemed most imperiously to require.

The objects to be attained were thus immense: the interests to be conciliated were of the highest importance, and at the same time apparently irreconcilable. The task was a fearful one, and the manner in which it has been executed, when it comes to be fairly developed, will seem little short of marvellous. If proof were necessary of what was generally thought at the time, of the burden the bank had assumed, and of its capacity to bear that burden, we might refer to the history of the subscription at the opening of the books. Great doubts were entertained whether it would be filled; in fact it was not filled during the twenty days prescribed by the law. There remained unsubscribed above three millions of dollars, nearly the whole of which was taken by one individual at Philadelphia.

I will now proceed to show what the bank has done; considering, first in order, the National objects it was designed to accomplish.

Among these—the most interesting, and in every point of view the most important—that which chiefly induced the passage of the law, was the introduction of an uniform currency, in sufficient quantity, to answer the purposes of circulation, so far, at least, as to enable the Government to collect and disburse its revenue. I mean a currency as nearly uniform as the nature of things did admit. It cannot be supposed to be within the power of any government, or of any bank, to make a dollar at New Orleans worth as much to a merchant in Boston, as a dollar in Boston; unless, indeed, he has employment for his dollar at New Orleans, in which case it may be worth more or less to him, according to circumstances. We might as well pretend to make a bag of cotton worth as much upon the plantation where it is produced, as in the warehouse at New York, or in the manufactory at Philadelphia. But this part of the subject has already been fully and ably handled by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) who has shown conclusively that the currency afforded by the Bank of the United States approaches nearer to uniformity throughout the whole extent of this great country, than has been attained by nations possessing at least equal advantages, and operating within much narrower limits.

Neither was it understood or expected that the bank would be able to place, and to keep in circulation, everywhere, as much as in each particular quarter of the Union might be wished or wanted. This is impracticable in regard to States and districts of country, as it is with respect to individuals. A parent may give to a child a fortune adequate to his support, and suited to his circumstances, but he cannot prevent him from wasting or parting with it, unless he imposes restrictions upon its use. The very phrase, a uniform currency, implies a currency that will pass everywhere—that will flow everywhere—without any obstruction but what arises from the expense of conveyance; of equal value everywhere, and, for that very reason, in unequal quantities. It is the precise distinction between the paper of the Bank of the United States, and the paper of the State banks; which, having no currency beyond certain local limits, remains within them in greater abundance than is necessary. It is the same distinction which exists between either kind of paper, when not redeemable, and gold and silver. We may illustrate it more clearly by an instance: A merchant in the State of Ohio makes a sale in Ohio, in order that he may be able to buy in Baltimore, or he sells in Baltimore that he may buy in New York. He wishes, in either case, to receive what will pay for his purchase in Baltimore or New York, and he carries from the place of sale to the place of purchase the amount that he has received. It has happened to most of us to have some experience of the nature of this distinction. Formerly, there was great complaint by travellers in some parts of New England, that the money, or rather the paper, they received in one town would not pass in another. There, I believe, the grievance has ceased. But in other parts of the country we experience it every day, being obliged continually to inquire whether the paper put into our hands in one place will be taken in payment in another, and feeling instantly the inconvenience, if, by mistake, we carry it beyond the limited bounds of its circulation.

Where the currency has the quality I have mentioned, that is, of uniform value, or nearly uniform, the quantity that will remain at any given place depends upon the course of trade; the quality depends upon its solidity; it is only to be obtained by buying or borrowing. The memorial to the Ohio Legislature, or the report of a committee of that body. (I do not know which, for I was not in the House when it was quoted by the gentleman from South Carolina.) complains, in substance, that such a currency was furnished to them. That is the amount of the complaint, for they say they were tempted to employ it in purchasing from the cities to the eastward beyond what they ought to have purchased. A very singular complaint, indeed, which charges upon others the consequences of their own imprudence. The complaint should be, that they did not keep what was given to them, or at least a portion of it, and use it, as they might have done, in the payment of their dues to the Government. There is no doubt, however, that they have approached, if they have not reached, the true cause of their present embarrassments. This currency would not have wandered away, and left them destitute of the means of paying their debts, if their local circulation had not been overcharged with State bank paper, depreciated from its abundance—too easily obtained—supplying the purposes of local exchange, and failing, when it was wanted, for the more extensive exchange, to which the United States Bank paper, from its uniform value, was exactly adapted. The paper and credits afforded by the Bank of the United States were thus banished by the local paper; they were sent off to perform the distant service of buying in the cities at the eastward, and the people of Ohio kept nothing to pay their debts but the paper of the State banks. This was their own fault, imputable to themselves alone. Time, economy, and the industry of the State, employed in producing what will buy money, or, in other words, what may be exchanged with those parts of the Union where the money has gone, will bring all right.

One of the charges made by the committee against the management of the Bank of the United States, (and which this is the most fit place to notice,) is on account of the supposed excessiveness of its loans in those States and cities against which there was a balance of trade—those which, to simplify the idea, were debtors, particularly in Kentucky, Ohio, in Baltimore, and Philadelphia. The argument they employ to sustain this charge, namely, that injustice was done to the States and cities which had the balance in their favor, or were creditors, has already been amply and conclusively refuted. It has been shown, indeed it appears from the statement of the report itself, that these loans were in the highest degree beneficial to the creditor States and cities, the money obtained by the borrowers going directly thither, and enabling them to obtain specie from the branches, to be employed in the manner most advantageous to themselves, either by their banks or by individuals. "The effect of these draughts upon the Northern offices, was, to compel the constant remittance of specie there," &c. (Report, p. 4.) How, then, it can be said "that those places were made tributary to Baltimore," I am altogether at a loss to understand.

But, considering the diffusion of an uniform currency throughout the United States, in sufficient quantities for public purposes, to have been an important public object, it will be easy to show that the imputed error is far from being censurable. To put in circulation such an uniform currency as has been described, in the manner most advantageous to the Union, it was necessary, when the bank was organized, to give a preference to those States against whom there existed an unfavorable balance. It would flow from them in payment of their debts, (retaining, if they were prudent, what was required for local purposes,) where it ought to go—that is, into the creditor States—and thus the creditor States be supplied. But what was thrown by the bank into the creditor States would never find its way to the debtor States, unless it were in the shape of loans by them, which was not to be expected. If an individual, having a sum of money to lend, was disposed to lend it to one of two persons, each of whom he was equally inclined to serve, and in both of whom he had confidence as to their ultimate ability to repay, if in that case he could lend it only to one, and it so happened that one of them was indebted to the other, would he be most likely to benefit both by lending it to the debtor, or by lending it to the creditor? The answer is obvious: if lent to the debtor, he would be enabled to apply it towards payment of his debt, retaining what might be necessary for more urgent wants, the creditor would receive his money, and both would derive some advantage; if lent to the creditor, none of it would find its way to the debtor. A different course would, perhaps, have been more for the interest of the institution, as it is always better to lead to the rich than to the poor—I mean better for the lender. But, if the object was to distribute an uniform currency throughout the United States, there was no error. That such a currency has been introduced, in sufficient quantities to answer all the purposes of the Government, cannot be controverted. It is undeniably proved by the fact, that the receipts and payments of the Treasury are ever made in a currency of uniform value. Neither can it be controverted that such a currency has been introduced into every quarter of the Union in sufficient quantity. If it has not remained in the places where it was introduced, that cannot be chargeable to the bank, for the bank had no power to prevent its migration or transfer. So far, therefore, as respects this great object—an uniform currency—the duty of the bank towards the public has been faithfully and fully performed.

Nearly connected with this subject, was the effort to make the branch notes payable everywhere, without regard to the place of payment indicated upon the face of them. It would undoubtedly have been a great public convenience, but it was more than the public had stipulated for, and more than the public had a right to expect. I think it easily demonstrable that the system could not be acted upon without great inconvenience and loss, and serious danger to the institution. It must be remembered, however, that the practice of the late Bank of the United States, whose notes were only payable or receivable at the place where they were made payable on their face, had been strongly (though I agree unreasonably) reprobated. It must be remembered, too, that many well-informed men believed in the practicability of the plan first adopted by the present bank; and probably nothing but experience (the most authoritative of all teachers) would have convinced them of their error. Under these circumstances the experiment was perhaps necessary to be made, in order that the public might be fully satisfied. It was certainly well meant and innocent. "The wants of the country and the interest of the bank (says the president in his letter of the 4th October, 1817, documents, page 28) require an extensive circulation of its paper; and it is the policy of the parent board to encourage the indiscriminate use of the notes of the bank, reserving for imperious circumstances and inevitable occasions the exercise of the legal right which it possesses of declining to receive or pay, except at the respective places where payment is promised on the face of the notes." The experiment has been made; experience has condemned the attempt. "Imperious circumstances" have compelled the bank to exercise the right it possesses; and I am glad to find that the report of the committee approves the change, and admits that it was made in the manner least exceptionable and inconvenient. There must be an end now to the complaint which has been made about this act of the bank.

I will now ask the attention of the Committee to another branch of the public management of the bank—that which regards its duties towards the Government. Of the manner in which these duties have been fulfilled, no one can be better qualified to judge than the Secretary of the Treasury; no one would more promptly feel the inconvenience of the smallest failure, as they are all intimately connected with the fiscal arrangements confided to his care. His testimony therefore ought to be of the greatest weight with the Committee, if indeed it be not quite conclusive. For distrust and suspicion must have acquired a most unreasonable and excessive influence in our deliberations, if they can incline us for a moment to question or doubt the statements of that high and distinguished officer. In a letter of the Secretary, during the last session of Congress, (the words of which I cannot quote, but to which every member may refer on the files of the House,) he expresses, according to my recollection, a general approbation of the conduct of the bank—as having exceeded his expectations. In his letter of the 4th December, 1818, the select committee of this House, (documents, page 95,) he states in detail how the specific duties of the bank towards the Government have been performed. I appeal to that letter to show that they have always been faithfully performed.

But the manner in which the bank has performed its duties towards the Government, the services it has rendered to the Government and nation, cannot be more plainly evinced than by a statement extracted from the documents furnished by the select committee. The bank commenced its operations about the 1st January, 1817, excepting a loan to the Government, of $500,000, made in December, 1816. The public deposits, on the 31st January, 1817, amounted to $1,147,772 97; in the following March they had risen to $11,615,017 62; the 30th April they were $11,345,796 75; and on the 29th July, $24,746,641 26. This, sir, was when the bank had been in operation but six months. That this immense amount of $24,746,641 26, was the saving of the revenue received during that time, no one will pretend. It was the accumulation of revenue previously collected, distributed throughout the United States, in credits of State banks, variously depreciated, and of which the Government could not be said to have the command because they were local, and of course applicable only where they happened to be, and where the public service did not require their expenditure. By this single operation, twenty-four millions were thus converted by the bank from depreciated, local currency, into specie, or, what was equivalent to specie, of universal circulation, and which the Government, through the agency of the bank, might apply, without expense, whenever, and wherever, its wants or its service required.

Another convention took place immediately after, highly advantageous to the Government, and, I must be allowed to add, extremely unfavorable to the bank. With $13,398,438 02, part of the $24,746,641 26, which had thus been appreciated, and rendered available to the Government, by the assumption of the bank, the Government, on the 31st July, 1817, redeemed, at par, $13,398,438 02 of the public debt, belonging to the bank, which had been paid in by the subscribers. The report speaks, in terms of censure, of what it styles the "unfounded and unnecessary complaint, by the officers of the bank, against this very prudent measure;" meaning the redemption of the debt. That it was the right of the Government to redeem, I do not deny. That the officer at the head of the Treasury, whose first duty is to the Government, was justified in the measure by a proper regard to the interests of the Government, I shall not at all question. I will admit, too, that, as the Government clearly had the right, and chose to exercise it, complaint by the officers of the bank was altogether useless. But, that the operation was prejudicial to the interests of the bank, and might reasonably cause some dissatisfaction in those to whom the interests of the bank was confided, I deem most perfectly evident, and altogether consistent with the zeal for the real welfare of the institution, in which some other parts of the report seem to suppose them to have been wanting. By the original plan, a large proportion of the capital was to consist of public debt, bearing an interest, with liberty to sell in small successive portions. The value of such a possession, to a new institution, which the report supposes ought to have "proceeded gradually, growing with the growth, and strengthening with the strength of the nation," (page 7) it requires no great financial skill to estimate. It was a sure resource for obtaining the means of extending their business, when that should become expedient, and in the mean time was productive. It was redeemed at par, when the market price was considerably higher. But, passing by this loss on the redemption, the mere circumstance of withdrawing at once thirteen millions of stock, and throwing suddenly upon the bank thirteen millions of money, for which they were to find immediate employment, must have materially, and most injuriously, interfered with their arrangements. There can be no doubt that it led directly to some of those measures (the extension of loans on stock, for instance) which the report most strongly disapproves. But, be that as it may, none can question the advantage of it to the Government.

By the redemption of the public debt, and payments of the Government, the public deposits in October, 1817, were reduced to $7,743,899 74. In October last (1818) the Government redeemed a moiety of the Louisiana debt, exceeding five millions of dollars, and this, too, was done through the agency of the bank.

Looking back to the period when the bank was established, considering the state of things at the moment when it came into existence, considering how short a time it had been in operation, and the difficulties it had to surmount, the effect is wonderful, and, to all unprejudiced minds, would seem to indicate a steady and faithful attention to all its public duties. Sir, that institution has been a servant, I had almost said a slave, to the public; a faithful servant, always forward, even at some expense to itself, and zealous to promote the public interests, in all their various and complicated relations. This is the spirit in which its affairs have been administered. It still continues to perform all its public duties, without affording just cause, in this respect, either of complaint or of reproach. I might add to this list of benefits, received by the Government and nation, the decided improvement that rapidly followed in the public credit of the country, both at home and abroad. If gentlemen doubt, let them consult the price current of stock here and in England.

The only allegation, indeed, of anything even approaching to a default in the public duty of the bank, is that contained in page ten of the report, where it is stated "that the amount done under that resolution (to discount notes for those who had revenue bonds to pay) was small," &c. This is certainly a mistake, as has been already shown from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, from the evidence of Major Butler, and from the fact that there has been no complaint. Such has been the inclination to censure, that you may rely upon it no well founded cause for it would have been suffered to escape. It is a mistake that arose from the circumstance, acknowledged by a member of the committee, (Mr. Mo-

LANE,) that the inquiry was ex parte. If they had asked for information, they would have learned, that at every discount day the directors had before them a list of the bonds that were coming due, and that they uniformly gave a preference to those who were to pay them, as far as they could do so consistently with the interests of the bank, of which I beg leave still to say they were the exclusive judges.

The next object of inquiry is, how the management of the bank has been conducted in regard to the interests of the stockholders. This is altogether independent of the question of violation of charter, which shall be considered separately hereafter.

In the progress of an institution like the bank, founded and established with a view to certain great public objects, perplexing questions might, and would, occasionally present themselves.—The interests of the public might, in some instances, be at variance with those of the stockholders. Which were to yield? If, upon every such occasion, the directors had allowed a paramount influence to the interests of the stockholders, and had sacrificed the public objects to the profits of the institution, the public would then have had some right to complain. But, if every public duty has been faithfully and fully performed, even beyond any reasonable expectation that could have been entertained, it is certainly a very singular inquiry to be made by Congress, whether the utmost has been done for the interest and profit of the stockholders. That is an investigation that belongs to the stockholders themselves, which they are competent to conduct, with the means in their hands of correcting errors, and removing grievances, by changing their officers. And what is to be the consequence if Congress should be of opinion that the institution has not been well managed for the interests of the stockholders? To alter the charter—to take away the charter—or subject it to the wasting and destructive process of a protracted judicial examination by scire facias? Have the stockholders made any complaint? Have they asked from us any relief? Not at all; on the contrary they implore us to abstain. You have upon your table a memorial to that effect from Boston, a memorial from New York, and an exceedingly well-reasoned memorial from Richmond, which deserves the attentive perusal of every member of the House. If their interests have been injuriously affected, they have, on that account, a stronger claim upon us. After we had gained so many objects of great national importance at their expense, would it not be iniquitous, yes sir, a national iniquity, now to deprive them, by a wanton exercise of unjust power, of all the hopes of an equivalent, founded upon the public faith, pledged to induce them to embark their property in this concern? Can you restore them to the state in which you found them? Will you return that part of the bonus which has by this time become due, and I presume been paid? Will you restore to them their stock and coin? Will you, finally, indemnify the subscribers, and the purchasers, who have bought upon the assurance of the charter, for the losses they will sustain? A gentleman from Virginia, a member of the committee, (Mr. TYLER,) seems to have intended to anticipate some of those inquiries, by saying that the bank, after paying all its debts, could now return to every stockholder "dollar for dollar." A most honorable concession, undoubtedly, as it respects the management of the bank, and one that goes far to answer every complaint against it. For, if the public service has been punctually performed, and the bank (after dividing eighteen per cent. in two years and a half) could now wind up its concerns, and pay every stockholder "dollar for dollar," no man who has the slightest acquaintance with the matter can deny that it must have been well managed. But how long would it require to gather the funds that have been scattered over the United States, so as to be able to restore them to the stockholders? Seven years have elapsed since the charter of the late bank expired; its concerns were much less extensive in amount, as well as in the space through which they were spread; it expired, too, under circumstances highly propitious for drawing in its resources; and the management of its affairs has been uncommonly able and faithful. I believe they are not yet closed. How long, then, I repeat, would it be, before this "dollar for dollar" would be restored to the stockholders? It is matter of conjecture—but still, with so much of certainty belonging to it, that no prudent man would give a stockholder anything like "dollar for dollar" for his share of the proceeds. Sir, I cannot reflect upon the mighty wreck, without astonishment at the coolness with which even the possibility of it seems to be contemplated. The organization destroyed, the fragments scattered over the whole United States, no longer obedient to any power but the power of time and chance, which, like the winds and the waves, may drive them to the shore, or may drive them where they can never be reached or collected.

The first topic of complaint is the too great liberality towards the State banks. As a charge of error, it may not be wholly without foundation. But it answers, fully and authoritatively, and I hope that the sequel will show, satisfactorily, one of the heaviest charges that has commonly been made throughout the country against the bank—the charge, I mean, of having acted with oppressive rigor towards the State institutions. I am glad the committee have cleared away this ground of accusation. At most, however, it proves only a mistake; a mistake on the right side, and a mistake that was almost inevitable. To bring about the payment of specie, within any reasonable period, and at the same time to avoid a severe pressure upon the State banks, and through them upon the community, it was indispensably necessary to treat those banks with the most indulgent liberality, where ever they manifested a sincere intention to return to the payment of specie. This was the inducement to the compact of the 31st January, 1817. Without such indulgence, the paper of the United States Bank, and that of the State banks, could not have circulated together. A good and a bad currency, or, if you please, a good and a better currency, can never associate in circulation. They must associate upon terms of equality, or approaching to equality, or they cannot associate at all. The Continental money banished gold and silver. When assignats were used in France, specie disappeared. When, by excessive issues, or from whatever other cause, the State bank paper was depreciated, coin was no longer used. Where it is now, from the same cause depreciated, (as in some parts of the Western country,) gold and silver, or notes of the Bank of the United States, equivalent to gold and silver, are not to be found. They will not be found there until either the better currency shall obtain the entire ascendancy, by banishing the State bank paper from circulation, or, by a removal of the causes that have occasioned depreciation, the latter shall be restored to an equality in value with the former, which is on every account most to be desired.

The next subject of complaint and censure is the resolution of the 28th November, 1816, for paying the dividends of foreign stockholders in London, at the par of exchange. I shall assume, for the purpose of treating this subject, a single maxim of justice, which every man will assent to as the only fair and reasonable rule of human judgment. It is, that, where an act is right in itself, the motives or reasons are not to be inquired into as a ground of crimination. They may strip the act of its claim to merit, but they can never expose it to criminal imputation. Charity, indeed, common charity, between man and man, that which the infirmity of our nature demands to be continually exercised towards each other, adopts and applies a much more comprehensive and benevolent rule—that, even where the act is wrong, yet it may be exempt from censure, if the motives were just and good. Sir, without deciding whether that resolution was right or wrong in itself, and admitting that it was one of those "general and abstract subjects to which the resolution of the House did not direct their attention," the report condemns it as a measure adopted with a view to speculation, that is, upon what they suppose to be bad motives. It is true, they take, also, another ground, which I will examine presently, namely, the possible loss to the American stockholders and Government. But they do not deny, and I think they most clearly admit, that the directors had a right to make the arrangement.

If it had been the policy of Congress to prevent foreigners from becoming stockholders in the bank, they would have expressed it by a prohibition in the charter. The matter was not overlooked; it was considered and discussed in this House, when the law was passed. If it was the policy of Congress to permit foreigners to become proprietors of the stock—and certainly the refusal to prohibit amounted to an invitation—would the directors have been justified in adopting measures to thwart and counteract that policy? It was their duty to execute the law in its spirit—to effectuate its intentions—to subserve, and not defeat, the policy of the Government. If, substituting their own conceptions of what was politic, for the rule given to them by the law, they had pursued a different system, they would have made themselves justly obnoxious to censure and reproach. Now, sir, the resolution in question had two objects—1. The payment, in London, of the dividends to foreign stockholders—2. The payment at the par of exchange. The first of these the report does not much object to. It was done by the late Bank of the United States, as to its own dividends. That bank also remitted to foreigners their interest upon the public debt of the United States, I believe, free of charge. This is powerful evidence that it was advantageous to the institution, for now that the whole history of the bank is before us, its life and its death, I suppose no one will deny that it was very fairly and skilfully managed. We have the example, too, of the Government, in the instances of the French and Dutch loans. Why was the interest stipulated to be paid abroad? Because it was favorable to the credit of the country; it enabled the Government to obtain loans which it could not otherwise have had, or to obtain them upon better terms. The mere inconvenience to the stockholder, the freedom from charges of receipt and remittance, when he has his interest sent to him, instead of being obliged to send after it, is a consideration of great moment—the same consideration which induces an individual to invest his money near to where he lives, though he might take a greater profit by investing it further off. Such an operation, however, was inconvenient to the Government, because it was not within the ordinary range of fiscal management; and, therefore, the Government proposed to exchange the foreign debt for a debt bearing interest, payable to the United States. As an inducement, they offered to increase the annual interest one-half of one per cent. France accepted the offer; the Dutch refused it, estimating the inconvenience of receiving their interest at home at more than the annual one-half of one per cent. Such an operation, though inconvenient and burdensome to the Government, is precisely adapted to the transactions of a bank, authorized by its charter to deal in exchange, and having established arrangements and credits for that purpose. It can remit and pay abroad with as much facility as it can pay at home. To my mind, therefore, it seems that the measure, so far as it regards the payment abroad, was not only justified by experience, by example, and by sound calculation, but that the neglect of it would have betrayed ignorance and want of foresight. I might instance, also, the Louisiana debt, which was taken by a single individual, or a single house, and sold at a profit, by stipulating to pay the interest abroad. The second part of the resolution regards the rate at which the bank would engage to remit, and at which the stockholder would stipulate to receive the remittance of his dividends. For, we must recollect that it was a mutual contract, binding upon both parties. The bank would pay abroad upon no other terms but those that were prescribed. It cannot be denied that the directors had a right to arrange the terms. Dealing in exchange is one of their legitimate powers, expressly given by the charter; and, as there is nothing which restricts them to successive unconnected instances, there can be no valid objection to such an exercise of the authority as is now the subject of discussion. There can be no doubt, therefore, of their right to "compel the American stockholders to contribute to the public loss" (Report, page 8,) upon exchange operations; and there can be none of its expediency and propriety, provided there was a well-grounded probability of profit instead of loss. The directors had before them the experience of the past. From two tables before me, I can say that, from the year 1791 to the year 1817, inclusive, the average of exchange has been greatly in favor of this country. The first of these is a statement from the Treasury, of the annual gain and loss upon remittances for payment of the Dutch loan, from 1791 to 1809. The gain is $409,197 20; the loss is $103,377 06. The clear gain upon the whole of the remittances, is $305,820 14. The other is a statement of the annual gain and loss by exchange, under the operations of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. There is an uninterrupted annual gain, amounting, altogether, to $482,361 20, with only an apparent exception in the years 1815 and 1816. The exception is only apparent, for it was owing, not to the state of exchange, but to the depreciation of the currency with which the bills were bought. At the very time, (and it is a convincing proof,) exchange in Boston, where a sound currency was maintained, was at or about par. Deduct those two years, ($129,640 66,) there is still a total gain of $352,720 54. As far as the past can afford us any light to look into the future, this exhibition might be relied upon. It was not of a year or years, but an unbroken series of six and twenty years in succession. It was not of a period of uniform character, either favorable or unfavorable. It embraced the infancy of our Government, the arrangement of our finances, years of prosperous commerce, and years when commerce was oppressed by formidable restrictions and impositions abroad, and by prohibitions and embargoes at home. It embraced a long period of peace, and a short period of war, (a proportion which I hope our history may always present;) it embraced, in short, exactly such a variety of circumstances as, in the ordinary course of events, may be expected to happen, and, for that very reason, exactly such a period as a prudent man would select for the basis of his calculation. Experience since, I am informed, has given its sanction to the measure. I do not know the fact, but I am told there has been a gain upon exchange. The committee of directors, who reported against the measure—who are complimented, and deservedly, too, for their able rea-squ—were, upon general grounds, in favor of it, as the report will show; and gave "able reasons," the same which finally decided the board to adopt it, namely, "the effect which it would have in reducing the rate of exchange, by inducing capitalists to invest their funds in the stock, and thereby facilitating the resumption of specie payments." They were deterred by then existing circumstances, which are now proved to have been temporary; and probably, among others, by the doubt whether a sound currency could or would be very speedily restored. The remittance of the dividends they recommended, without qualification. We are to recollect, also, that one of the terms was a delay of six months. The January dividend was to be paid in the following July, and the July dividend in January. Supposing three months necessary for making the remittance, there would remain three months, during which the bank might have the use of the money, equal at least to one-and-a-half per cent; and during which, too, the bank would have the range for selecting the most favorable moment to buy exchange. Its range for selection would, indeed, be much more extensive—it would be almost unlimited; for, as it was authorized to deal in exchanges, it would always have funds or credit abroad, to be supplied or drawn upon, according to the state of the market for bills.

If this measure was right to be adopted at all, it was right to be adopted at that time, and precisely for the reason assigned in the letter of Mr. Donnell. If foreigners were to become the owners of stock, it was for the interest of the American stockholder, as well as for the interest of the nation, that the rise should take place before they became purchasers, rather than afterwards. This is a proposition that no one will be inclined to dispute, and of course it cannot, with any color of reason, be denied, that if measures were in the contemplation of the directors, which would have a tendency to enhance the value of the stock, they were bound in duty to adopt them, in the early part of the institution, so that the American stockholder might have the benefit of the rise, and not the foreigner; and the nation have the advantage of the increase of the exchangeable or market value of the stock. The prospect of the enhancement of price was itself an equivalent to the American stockholder for any possible loss on exchange. But, while I agree that paying the dividends in England (which is not objected to) was calculated to raise the price of the stock, for the reasons before stated, I am not satisfied that paying at the par of exchange would necessarily have that effect. If it was likely to be advantageous to the bank, as I believe it was, it was for the same reason likely to be disadvantageous to the foreign stockholder. What the one gained on exchange, the other would lose. The materials for calculation were as open to the one as to the other. The report seems to suppose that it would raise the market in England, and that the rise there would operate upon the market here. The reasoning is incorrect, because it looks only at one side of the question. We may affirm, with equal truth, that, if it was disadvantageous to the American stockholder, it would depress the market here, and that the depression would affect the market in England. The market abroad for our stocks is regulated by our own, rather than our own by the foreign; though, doubtless, they do somewhat affect each other. The only question, however, at last, is the one which I have before stated, and I hope satisfactorily answered: Was there a reasonable prospect of gain from this arrangement? But the gentleman from Virginia, who was one of the select committee, (Mr. TYLER,) has advanced an opinion, not the less extraordinary and unexpected for the explanation of it given by the chairman. He thinks that even if there was a gain, it would not increase the dividends of the American stockholder, because, if I understand him correctly, the remittances would not be made till after the dividend, and the loss or gain would not till then be ascertained. What does he suppose would become of the gain? Would it not go into the general profits of the bank? He did not recollect that, though the remittance would follow one dividend, it would precede another, through the whole term of the charter. It might with equal correctness be affirmed, and for the same reason, that the dividend could not be diminished by a loss on exchange, and then, I suppose, we should arrive at a result exactly right, that the dividends would neither be increased nor diminished. A moment's reflection will convince him of his error. And now, sir, I may be allowed to ask, whether this arrangement is not what every man would have made in his own case? Is it not what every merchant does habitually, and every planter too? Why, then, should we impute it to unworthy motives?

Another, and a heavier charge, in the estimation of the report, is that which relates to loans on the deposit or pledge of stock of the bank. It is not disputed, and it cannot be disputed, that the directors had a right to lend on any sort of personal security not prohibited by the charter. It is equally beyond dispute that the stock was a good security. The gentleman from South Carolina has stated, and the gentleman from Virginia has agreed, that, in the event of a dissolution, the stock loans at par would settle themselves. If that be so, the security is unexceptionable. It is demonstrable, further, that, under the circumstances, the loans on stock were judicious, and for the interest of the institution. These loans did not originate in occasional resolutions; they had their origin in the fourth of the by-laws, adopted before the bank went into operation, in the month of December, 1816. The by-law is referred to in the report. There were vices in the banking system, as it was then commonly conducted, which the directors of the Bank of the United States were anxious, as far as possible, to correct. Among them, was the use of accommodation, or "credit the drawer" paper. Another, and a very serious one, was the extensive practice of mutual endorsements. A man who wished to get a discount was obliged to borrow the name of a friend, and, by borrowing, came under a well understood obligation to lend his own name in return. A connexion was thus formed that involved both in the fate of either. If one failed, he dragged the other after him; and indeed it often happened that, by multiplied entanglements of this sort, the ruin of one man injured, perhaps destroyed, the credit of many. The fourth by-law was intended, and honestly and prudently intended, to diminish these evils. It provided that accommodation paper should not be discounted; and, to limit as much as practicable the evil of mutual endorsements, it invited persons applying for discounts to deposit personal security instead of endorsers. The subsequent resolutions of the board, (excepting that of the 25th August, 1817, which shall be distinctly considered,) were evidently adopted only to carry the fundamental by-law into execution, by extending it to the branches, and by declaring the rates and other terms upon which the several kinds of stock should be received in pledge or deposit. They were thus, by a very obvious reference to the original source, freed from the suspicion of having been produced by occasional motives of speculation, and placed upon their true foundation; which no one, I think, will deny, is solid enough to sustain them. Such was the character of the resolutions of the 18th December, 1816—(Documents, page 65,) and of the 25th July, 1817.

The resolution of the 25th August, 1817, authorized the loan of $125 upon stock, with two approved endorsers, who, as the report explains it, were only to be security for the 25 per cent. excess beyond the par value of the stock deposited. This resolution, I have no hesitation to say, I do not approve, for reasons, however, very different from those stated in the report. Sir, the directors themselves did not long approve it. The resolution was acted upon but a very short time, not more than a week or ten days, and the amount loaned under it appears, from the documents, to have been small. Let us now for a moment examine the operation of these measures. The amount of discounts on stock remaining unpaid on the 30th July, 1817, was $5,221,267 60—(Documents, page 60.) The total amount of discounts, then, was $25,770,120 59. So that there were loaned on personal security about $20,000,000, and on stock about $5,000,000, which no one can affirm to have been an undue proportion. If the original by-law, and the resolutions made in pursuance of it, were right, there was now additional motive for desiring to extend their operation—that is, to increase the loans on stock. It was originally designed, as I have already stated, that the capital of the bank should be composed in part of public debt, bearing interest, and to be gradually converted into active capital. The whole of it, exceeding thirteen millions, and including two millions which the bank had endeavored to convert into specie, for the benefit of the country, was redeemed at par on the 31st July, 1817, and in place of it thirteen millions of money were thrown into the bank, for which the directors were to find employment. If they were desirous to place a part of it upon stock, upon a good security, bearing some resemblance to that which had thus been taken from them, rather than hazard it all at once upon personal security, it was a natural, a prudent, and a commendable desire, and it was in precise conformity with the original plan of the bank, as well as with the "gradual extension" which the report, in one part, thinks was expedient. It was a desire, nevertheless, however prudent, not likely to be gratified. The stock was then rising, and reached somewhere about $140, as appears from the table of prices exhibited by the committee. They were not to expect stock to be deposited at par, when its market price was $140. On the contrary, with a rising market, there would be a constant tendency to escape from the deposit, and to disappoint the wish of the directors, which was to increase and not to diminish this kind of security. It was under the influence of views like these, I should suppose, (as stated by the late President, in his examination, among the documents) that the resolution of the 26th of August was adopted, combining the two kinds of loan—on personal security, and on stock, in order to increase the quality of the latter. I repeat that I do not approve of this resolution, and for this simple reason, that, as, in the discounts upon stock, they regarded only the security, and not the person, or the amount, I do not see how the two kinds of loan could thus be combined, without the temptation to lend more to individuals upon the personal security, than was either prudent or proper; inasmuch as the loan upon the personal security was always to bear a fixed proportion to what was considered as lent upon the stock. But the question is, whether it was sincerely adopted, for the reasons given, and not to promote a scheme of stockjobbing. The board soon put an end to its active existence, which must be regarded as some evidence at least of sincerity.

What are the objections made to this kind of discount? Not that they were insecure or imprudent, or unprofitable. No. To the whole of the loans on stock it is objected, that they inflated the price of the stock; in the language of the report, "kept it constantly advancing, until it reached a point where it exploded and fell," (page 11.) The first point to be established, in order to support this position, is, that the stock ever has been inflated beyond its real value. What is its real value? Sir, it is (within certain limits) matter of opinion, matter of conjecture, depending upon a thousand considerations, and, among the rest at the present moment, depending upon the decision of the House. What will it rise to hereafter? No one can tell. It is an institution of great resources, calculated, I believe, if supported by the public confidence, to be a blessing to this nation, in peace a bond of union, a sinew of strength in war. But what, at any given time, will be the price of its stock, I will not venture to predict. Have purchasers been injured? That depends upon what the price will come to hereafter. But, though I will not undertake to answer either of these questions, nor hazard any opinion upon the value of the stock, yet, in justice to the bank, I will venture to say, that, as far as my knowledge extends, there never was any great moneyed institution established, there never was any great moneyed operation commenced, that produced so little speculation. I do not advance this hastily, and I do not wish it be assented to without full reflection. Speculation, stockjobbing, these are the substance of all the charges, or the coloring spread over them all. Where is the instance of a new institution, in which there was so much steadiness, so little extravagant speculation? The maximum of the price of its stock (see table among the documents) was in the latter part of August, 1817, when it had gradually reached 56 per cent. advance. Do gentlemen recollect, or have they heard what happened when the public debt was funded? One would suppose that nothing could have been less fit to occasion speculation. The amount was fixed, and could not be exceeded; the rate of interest was fixed at the current rate of the country; the period and manner of redemption were also fixed; everything, in short, was reduced to the greatest possible certainty—yet the six per cent. stock rose to twenty-six shillings and three pence. It afterwards fell considerably below par, and did not recover till, I think, after the year 1803. We have another, and a much more striking, instance in the establishment of the late Bank of the United States. The scrip, for which ten dollars had been paid, and no more, rose to two hundred and seventy dollars. Fortunes were made and lost. The roads between the commercial cities are represented to have been covered with expresses, conveying intelligence of the fluctuations of the market, in order that they might be advantageously seized. The stock of that bank, I have been informed, but do not speak positively, afterwards fell below par. Sir, I have seen many moneyed institutions established, and though I have had little to do with them, I have nevertheless had occasion to observe their usual progress. Their history is nearly the same. At first, their stock has an extravagant rise, then succeeds an equally extravagant depression, and afterwards it finds what may be termed its just or natural level, that is, the level at or nearly to which it rests, unless disturbed by some extraordinary occurrence, or moderately advanced by a gradual improvement. The stock of the late Bank of the United States may be considered as having settled at about fifty advance, after all speculation had ceased. In the year 1802, the United States sold 2,220 shares at forty-five advance, and they sold to a person who bought to sell again, and, of course, to sell at a profit. I have always understood that he did sell at a profit. Individuals sold as high as fifty advance. (Seybert's Stat. An.) The permanent advance, therefore, was very little short of what has been deemed the inflated or speculative price of the present bank. I am aware that it may be said, and truly said, that the late bank had some advantages which the present does not possess. But, the existing bank has also some which were not possessed by the former. At the period we are speaking of, when its stock rose to fifty-six, it had this most striking advantage, that not a year of its charter had expired, and there were above nineteen years remaining, whereas, when the stock of the late bank was at fifty, eleven years had run out and only nine remained. This inflated price, therefore, was very little higher than the level stationary price of the stock of the late Bank of the United States.

It is not correct to say, that it "exploded and fell." (Report, page 11.) Allowing all reasonable indulgence to the figure, it means, if I understand it, that the price was suddenly precipitated, when the artificial means used for its elevation had ceased to operate, or ceased to produce any effect. It is not correct. The table of prices annexed to the report of the committee shows that its decline was gradual, and that decline can be traced to other causes, which I will advert to presently. The price was highest in August, 1817; it began to fall, but not materially, in September, 1817—and it had not arrived at the lowest point of depression, (110) what in the table is called "the lowest price," till November and December, 1818, more than a year after the depression began. The table does not give us the intermediate prices, but we know, from other sources, that the decline was not considerable during the first part of that period. It may be dated, chiefly, from the Summer of 1818, and may be traced to causes which not only had no connexion with artificial means, but are wholly inconsistent with their use.

Again, sir, let us examine, in another point of view, these charges against the loans upon stock.

The price, on the 20th August, 1817, was from 144 to 147, to which it had gradually attained. How could successive repeated advancements of price be owing to a resolution adopted before the organization of the bank, permanent in its nature, and operating uniformly from the first adoption? There is some confusion in the treatment of this part of the subject. One would be led, by the language of the report, to suppose that there were successive measures brought forward from time to time, and calculated continually to stimulate the market, which was stimulated accordingly. The fact is not so; it was a system—the foundation was laid in the 4th by-law, and the subsequent resolutions, all conformable to that by-law, were merely executive or ministerial, to carry it into effect. The committee have themselves furnished the most conclusive evidence that the supposed facilities for obtaining money were not so eagerly seized upon, and for that very reason not calculated to produce the effect imputed. The amount loaned upon stock, prior to the 30th of July, 1817, had been $8,046,932 64. It was at that time only $5,221,267 60. (Documents, page 70.) Of course, $2,815,665 04 had then been redeemed and withdrawn voluntarily, as respects the borrowers, and against the policy and the true interests of the bank. The bank could not lend in this way as much as it might prudently desire. This statement is what I alluded to, when I said some time ago that there was a continual tendency in the desposite to escape. That the resolution of the 20th of August (for advancing $135) had no influence in raising the price, is most evident. On that day it was at $150, nearly the maximum; it rose but very little in the next three or four days, and then, instead of rising, began to decline.

But this resolution is supposed by the report, (page 11,) "to have given equal facilities to the bankrupt, who had not credit enough to obtain an endorser, and to the capitalist. Stock could be and was purchased without the advance of a cent by the purchaser, who had only to apply to the directors, or to the president and cashier, between discount days, for a loan on the shares about to be bought, and, by what is termed a simultaneous operation, he obtained his discount, and with it paid for his stock. A rise in the market would enable him to sell his shares, pocket the difference, and commence operations anew." Nothing can be more inaccurate, more strikingly inaccurate, than the whole of this reasoning; and nothing more destitute of solid support than the hasty condemnation founded upon it. It fails entirely in point of fact. For, in the first place, the price of stock, on the 26th of August, 1817, was $150. A loan could be obtained upon it of only $125. There remained, therefore, $25 a share to be supplied from the resources of the purchaser. Again: for the $25 excess beyond the par value of the share, "two approved names" were required. (Documents 79.) Thus the borrower was to find an "approved" endorser, and was to furnish $25 a share in addition to what the bank would lend him. How, then, can it be affirmed that this resolution "gave facilities to the bankrupt, who had not credit enough to obtain an endorser?" How can it be said that, by means of it, stock could "be purchased without the advance of a cent?" Or that, with the money obtained from the bank, the purchaser "could pay for his stock?" [Here Mr. SPENCER rose to explain, and stated, that the reasoning quoted from the report was not meant to apply to the resolution of the 26th of August, but to the previous resolutions authorizing loans at par.] Sir, the reasoning immediately follows the statement of the resolution of the 26th of August, and seems to me most especially, if not exclusively, applied to that resolution. But I accept the chairman's explanation—and will the reasoning be any better? Rather worse, I think. Under the resolution of the 26th of August, the purchaser was to furnish $25 a share, in money, and an endorser for $25 more. Under the resolutions for loaning at par, he would have to advance $50 a share, which I suppose would be at least as difficult for "a bankrupt," and quite as inconsistent with the idea of buying "without the advance of a cent," as advancing $25, and finding an endorser for $25 more.

While I am upon this part of the subject, I would take the liberty of asking a question of the 15th CON. 2d SESS.—44 chairman of the select committee. The report (page 11) says, that "a rise in the market would enable him (the purchaser) to sell his shares, pocket the difference, and commence operations anew." I should be glad to be informed how many times a man must commence such operations anew, how many times he must buy and sell in a market "constantly advancing," before he will make a profit? If the market was "constantly advancing," as the report states it was, it would seem to me very difficult to understand how successive operations could benefit the speculator. I should suppose, from a plain calculation, that the oftener he bought and sold the less stock he would have, and, repeating the "operation" a sufficient number of times, and a slight depression supervening, he would inevitably lose his whole capital.

The report, sir, goes on to charge that the loans were "unreasonable and excessive," were not made "to merchants and traders," but "to a few persons, consisting of directors, brokers, and speculators," and that very little "good business paper was done." (Report 10, 11.) Upon what foundation of fact these charges rest, we are not precisely informed. The members of the committee have referred to a list of borrowers which has not been printed, and they have differed from each other as to the true purport of that list. The member from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDE,) one of the committee, has stated that a large proportion of the borrowers were "merchants and traders." It is of no manner of consequence, for it is not denied, but it is agreed that these loans were offered indiscriminately to all who could give the required security, that they were made with impartiality, and without favoritism; and that, in making them, the directors did not regard the occupation of the borrower, provided he offered good security. Was not the security unexceptionably good—the best that could be offered? Suppose the same "speculators" had got discounts on funded debt, would there then be any complaint? Where, then, is the point of this accusation? Do gentlemen mean to establish a high moral standard, graduated not by the laws of the land, nor with any reference to the nature of the subject, by which the directors of the bank are to be governed in exercising a censorial authority over the lives and occupations of those who come to borrow, and by which they are themselves in turn to be tried and censured? We are all of us fond of power, and sufficiently inclined to abuse it. What power could be more dangerous; what more liable to abuse; what more inevitably tending to generate a tyrannical spirit in the heart of man, than such an authority—no matter by whom exercised—to become a censor and inquisitor of the thoughts, and occupations, and conduct of his fellow creatures; to judge them, not by the laws of the land, not by any defined or established rule, but by an arbitrary and fanciful theory of his own creation? Sir, is it not enough that these loans were not prejudicial to the interests of the institution—that the security was unexceptionable—that they were impartial and general? Is it not enough that there were at least very plausible reasons, if not conclusive ones, for making them? Is it not enough that they were prohibited by no law, and that they were made by the directors under a discretion committed to them; that they are still safe and good; that they were made to persons exercising occupations not forbidden by law, who were not prohibited from borrowing, and to whom it was not unlawful to lend? If they were right in themselves, let us not engage in needless inquiries that can do no possible good, and may do much mischief.

But the report expresses surprise "at finding so little good business paper done at the bank and its offices." How, in the course of such an examination, (completed in three weeks,) it was ascertained what quantity of "business paper," usually so called, was done at the "bank and its offices," or what "good" business paper was done, or whether any was done that was bad, or whether any good or bad was refused, and for what reasons, I am at a loss to understand, especially as there was no opportunity for explanation. I take it for granted, from other parts of the report, that this phrase is meant to apply, though applied inaccurately, to loans on stock, as contradistinguished from loans on personal security. In that sense, without admitting our right to regulate the business of discounts, the surprise expressed appears to be unwarranted. When the loans on personal security were $20,000,000, the loans on stock were $5,000,000; when the loans on personal security were $30,000,000, the loans on stock were $11,000,000; and that proportion never was exceeded. (See documents page 70, and table 43.)

There is still another accusation, which I have heard here and elsewhere, and which, for that reason, I have been at some pains to examine. The "curtailment" (says the report, page 11) "fell, in almost all cases, upon the business paper;" by which is here meant the paper for loans on personal security. The table 43 furnishes a most conclusive answer to this allegation.

The greatest amount loaned on stock appears to have been in Jan. and Feb., 1818 $11,244,514 19
In Nov., 1818, it was reduced to 8,934,712 94

Reduction . . . . . 2,309,801 25

The greatest amount loaned on personal security was, in March and April, 1818 $30,318,932 50
In November it was reduced to 26,989,992 12

Reduction . . . . . 3,328,940 38

The reduction on stock is beyond all proportion greater than on the personal security paper.

Take another period—that given by the committee. In July, 1818, the loans on stock were—
November, 1818 . . . . . $10,657,125 85
8,934,712 94

Reduction . . . . . 1,722,412 91

In July, 1818, loans on personal security were—

November, 1818 . . . . . $28,836,670 28

Reduction . . . . . 1,846,678 16

There is another period stated, (June and July,) which gives a result somewhat different, but still shows the stock loans to have been more than proportionably reduced. The first, however, is most fair, as it gives a reasonable range.

I have gone into these details, sir, not for the mere purpose of differing from the Committee, or pointing out inaccuracies in the report, but to avoid hasty results, from a superficial examination. The conclusion, so far as we have gone, is, that the inferences are not warranted. Every measure is fairly accounted for, provided you examine it upon its own merits, free from the prejudice of extrinsic considerations. I shall trouble you no more with particulars that must, necessarily, be tedious and uninteresting. There is one allegation of the report, however, which the chairman has voluntarily corrected, admitting that the language is broader than he meant it to be. It is the assertion, in page ten, that "the principal business of the bank certainly has been to discount on notes secured by a pledge of stock;" an assertion which, as it stands in the report, did certainly occasion some astonishment. It is now explained to be meant only of the operations at Philadelphia. We have no table that shows how much of each kind of paper was done at Philadelphia, and, therefore, cannot fix with any precision what is to be understood by this vague expression, "the principal business." But, is it not easy to account, and to account fairly, too, for the fact, supposing it to be as stated? The largest loans on stock would naturally be where the largest quantity of stock was held, and where there was most of that kind of security to offer. The largest loans were accordingly at Philadelphia and Baltimore. The list of subscriptions to the bank (No. 47) gives us the following: At Philadelphia, 88,529 shares; at Baltimore, 40,141; at New York, 20,012; at Boston, 24,023. It is worth remarking, though not directly applicable to the present purpose, that at Charleston there were 25,986 shares subscribed, more than either at New York or Boston. At Richmond, 16,987 shares; at Washington, 12,708; and at Lexington, Kentucky, 9,587—nearly half as many as at New York. I would remark, further, with regard to the loans on stock at Philadelphia, that they were not confined to stockholders in Philadelphia, but a considerable part of them was for persons residing in different parts of the Union, who, from some cause or other, found it most convenient to get their loans there. This is a fact well known to all the committee, from whom I have derived it.

But the heaviest charge of all, in the estimation of the report, that which pervades and gives a color to the whole, at the same time that it is of no manner of importance in the present inquiry, is the charge of speculation, made against individual directors and officers of the institution. How far it may be justifiable or proper thus to scrutinize the private transactions of men, in order to fasten upon them, by what is termed an ex parte inquiry, the imputation of an undefined and undefinable offence—to hold them up to public odium, under the authoritative sanction of a committee of this House—it would be useless now to inquire. Speculation and speculation, sir, are terms of very vague import, and of very extensive application. There are speculators of many kinds—there are speculators in lands—there are speculators in merchandise—there are speculators in manufactures—there are speculators in stocks; the variety is infinite, and in no country upon earth greater than in this. Everything about us invites to speculation. Such are the resources, such the youthful energy of our happy country, that a man can scarcely apply his labor or his money amiss; wherever he employs them he is sure of a liberal and rapid increase. Not an axe sounds in the forest, without adding to the sum of national wealth. I should like, then, to know, in what the discrimination consists, which makes one kind of speculation offensive, and another innocent, if both are permitted by law, and neither unfairly or fraudulently conducted. What is the difference between speculating in land, and speculating in merchandise, or the stocks? Sir, the charter does not prohibit dealing in the stocks, either to directors or to the officers of the institution; it is, therefore, not unlawful or criminal. The omission, with respect to the officers, cannot have been casual or accidental. If my recollection be accurate—I do not speak positively—it was prohibited, as well as every other kind of trading, to the officers of the late Bank of the United States. I know it is prohibited by law in most of the State institutions. It is impossible that it should have escaped the attention of Congress. But let us examine this matter, and not be carried away by general denunciation. That a man might subscribe, and yet be a director, is not to be questioned; none but a subscriber could be a director. Every subscription had a view to profit or advantage, and was so far a speculation. Every large subscription had a view to profit by selling, and the larger the subscription, the greater speculator was the subscriber, and the more was he interested in advancing the value and price of the stock. Was he, on that account, incapacitated to be a director? On the contrary, was it not thought, and with some appearance, at least, of reason, that the greater his stake in the institution, the more he would feel interested in its prosperity? Again: the committee, adopting a distinction I do not very well understand, find no fault with a director for buying or for selling. And yet, is it not most obvious, that the one operation would make it his interest to depress, and the other to raise, the price; that in the one case he might buy as cheap, and in the other sell as dear as possible? The whole censure of the report is directed against those who bought and sold—who dealt in the stock. It would be very difficult to make out that one who thus dealt in buying and selling was more likely to be affected by it in his conduct as a director, than one who only bought, or one who only sold. On the contrary, as his interest would be sometimes on one side, and sometimes on the other, he would be less likely to be permanently influenced, or influenced at all. But this is, itself, mere matter of speculation, and speculation of the most dangerous sort; because it subjects the conduct of men to speculative examination, and to speculative conviction. It is a speculation upon character, where there ought to be, and where there is, a plain practical rule that will be sure to guide us to a safe result. Upon this part of the subject I wish to be clearly understood. The rule a man may think proper to lay down for the government of his own conduct, is one thing; the rule he will adopt in judging the conduct of others, is another. If he choose to fix a standard for his own government, no matter how high he may raise it, if he aim at all the perfections contained in the table of the illustrious Franklin, so much the better. If he should fail, as he assuredly will, of reaching the highest point, he will nevertheless be rewarded for his pains. He will promote his own happiness, and, from the difficulties he has to struggle with, he will learn a lesson of charity towards others, which increased contentment with himself, at every step of his progress, will every day more and more qualify him to practise. But when a man comes to judge the conduct of others, let him beware how he applies to it a severer rule than the law of the land and the law of their peculiar condition has laid down. Sir, I know nothing, by experience, of speculation. I have never dealt in the stock of this bank. I have never bought a share, nor sold a share, nor been interested in the purchase or sale of a share. I have never borrowed a dollar from the bank. But I claim no credit for forbearance. When I am not here, endeavoring to serve my constituents according to the humble measure of my abilities, I am engaged in the labors of a profession which do not consist with engagements in trade, or dealing, or speculating, or borrowing. These are no part of my business, and whether I abstain from them because I think it prudent, or because I think it right—from motives of policy, or from motives of a higher nature—is altogether indifferent. I choose to abstain from them, and no one has any right to inquire why I do so. I acknowledge that I should be wanting in consistency of character, and might be justly exposed to suspicion, if, upon becoming a bank director, I were to abandon my former habits and occupations, and become a dealer in money and in stock. But, if you make directors of men whose daily business and occupation it is to trade, to buy and to sell, to deal in stocks and in money, and such men are not proscribed, they are indeed the very men who are deemed best qualified to be directors—do you expect them thenceforth to give up their occupations, to purify themselves from the love and desire of gain, in order that they may be qualified for the due performance of the trust, or escape the charge of being speculators and stockjobbers? It is idle to talk of it. Nobody expects it, nor do I know that it is to be wished. If there is any evil experienced, the stockholders have power to correct it by election or by law. But, there is a plain practical rule upon this subject, safe and sure in its application. Has all this imputed speculation affected prejudicially the interests and management of the bank? If the trust has been betrayed, if the bank has been mismanaged towards the public, and the property of the stockholders sacrificed to subserve the purposes of speculation, let condemnation fall with its heaviest weight upon those who have abused the confidence reposed in them. This is the question, if we are to discuss any question respecting the management of the bank. To this question I have endeavored to draw the attention of the House; and if the views I have presented be at all correct, I think it has been fully and satisfactorily answered.

Justice to those who have had the direction of the bank requires a few words more. You have, it seems to me, the strongest positive evidence of the sincerity of the directors, and of their confidence in the administration of the bank. Did they sell out before the fall of price took place? With one only exception, I believe—any member of the Committee can correct me, if I am in error—with one single exception, the directors, who are charged with speculation, held and continued to hold at that very time quite as large if not a larger quantity of stock than they had held at any antecedent period; thus resting their own hopes and fortunes upon the stability of their measures. Again: the fall of price itself was owing to their own acts of management—acts that were necessary and proper, but which they must have foreseen would unavoidably depress the market. We know full well that it is the rate of dividend that chiefly regulates the permanent price of every stock. Did they ever make an unjustifiable dividend? It is not pretended. The first serious impression made upon the market, was by the reduced dividend of three and a half per cent. in July last. I say reduced, in comparison with the former dividends, which had been four per cent. That affected the stock. Then came the change in the character of the branch notes, which occasioned some uneasiness, and much unfounded clamor. At the same time there was a rapid reduction of discounts, which had the double effect of lessening the prospect of dividends, and of diminishing the quantity of money in circulation; both calculated to lower the price of stock. These were measures necessary and proper for the security and safety of the institution, now approved by every one; but they were all measures most obviously unfavorable to the market. They were adopted, and persevered in by the directors, because they were necessary and proper, who thus gave to the public and the stockholders the surest pledge of their fidelity to the trust, and of their determination to give it a preference to any interests of their own.

Of the officers of the institution, it would be sufficient to say, that neither the law nor the stockholders restrained them from trading, and there is no reason to believe that they have in any instance neglected or betrayed their duty. In what I have heretofore submitted to the House, I have founded myself almost exclusively upon the documents furnished by the committee. Will the House permit me to say one word from my own personal knowledge? Sir, I have had full opportunity to observe the conduct of the late president, (Mr. Jones,) and I can assure the House that I believe no institution ever had a more honest, zealous, and devoted officer. He has sacrificed his health in its service, by incessant and laborious exertions to promote its prosperity, which seemed, indeed, to be the only object of his thoughts and cares. I know not who may be hereafter placed at the head of the bank, nor will I pretend to enter into any comparison of other qualifications; but I am sure that I wish no bad wish for the institution, when I express a hope that all its future presidents may be as faithful, as honest, as industrious, and devoted, as Mr. Jones.

It is time to come to a conclusion of what relates to the management of the bank. Can I ask more to sum up the evidence of its fidelity, than the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) that if dissolved it is now able to pay dollar for dollar?

That there have been some errors cannot be doubted, but they have been mere errors, such as will happen, and they have always been on the right side. Among them, however, I do not consider the practice of selling drafts to be one. It is the right of the bank, admitted to be so in the report, (page 5.) It is perfectly fair, and one of the most legitimate sources of profit, inasmuch as it is expressly indicated in the charter. Upon what principle, then, is it, that what an individual may do without reproach, is not to be done by the bank? Why, having a fair marketable commodity to dispose of, shall it not sell at the fair market price? Why should it not in this respect be put upon an equal footing with individuals? Until these questions are answered, it is unnecessary to say anything further. A premium or advance is an indemnity for the remittance of funds, varying a little, according to circumstances. Ought the bank to remit the funds of individuals at its own expense? It would be unjust as respects the bank; it would be objectionable as regards the community; for it would open the door for favoritism and partiality. A fixed rate (which the report, page 5, thinks ought always to be observed) is plainly impracticable. But of this I need say no more. It is now settled upon its just foundation; it is the right of the bank, and does no wrong to any one, as no man is obliged to buy from the bank, or sell to the bank, but makes the bargain voluntarily and for his own convenience. I am confident, however, what the report says in page 5, of the fluctuation from one to five per cent. is incorrect. It must be a mistake.

I forbear to trespass further on the patience of the Committee upon this part of the subject, and proceed at once to the second general ground of inquiry.

Has the charter been violated so as to work a forfeiture? This single question would afford materials for a very copious discussion—much more copious than I am disposed to undertake, after having already taken up so much of your time. I would address myself first to those gentlemen who hold the opinion that Congress have no Constitutional power to charter a bank. Such an opinion, I know, admits of no compromise, but certainly there is a great difference between the question that arises when it is proposed to establish a bank, and that which presents itself when it is proposed to pull down and destroy an established institution. The very repeal of a law admits its Constitutional validity, for, if it is unconstitutional, it is void of itself; and, therefore, a vote for a repeal can scarcely be regarded as the expression of an opinion that the law is unconstitutional. I lay no stress at this time upon the repeated recognitions, which must now be considered as having definitely settled the construction of the Constitution. Every one can give it its due weight. But, I would ask gentlemen to remember that the charter of this bank received all the Constitutional sanctions, was promulgated to the country and to foreigners as a Constitutional law, and has now been two years in force. Great interests are connected with its existence, incalculable mischiefs, public and private, will follow its repeal, and among them not the least considerable will be the wound inflicted upon the character and credit of the nation. How shall we stand in the estimation of foreigners? I am afraid to follow out the inquiry. Let every one reflect for himself, and, as he values the national reputation, so let him decide. I cannot, however, at all understand the grounds upon which gentlemen who have Constitutional objections can vote for a scire facias. That proceeding distinctly admits the legal existence of the bank, and sends it to the judiciary to be tried for its life, to determine whether it has not forfeited its right to continue longer to exist—an admission wholly inconsistent with the opinion alluded to. But, of this, every member must judge for himself.

If Congress had a power to incorporate a bank, and have exercised that power according to the Constitution, no argument can be necessary to prove that we have no right to repeal the charter. This is a settled, established principle, founded in the nature of the power, and almost universally conceded. Chartered rights are sacred things; they are the rights of individuals, guaranteed to them by the public authority, and of which no lawful authority can deprive them but that which the charter itself prescribes, or which is implied from its nature to be exercised in the manner pointed out by the charter, and according to the law of the land. Any other mode of proceeding to deprive this legal being of existence would be an act of lawless, unjust violence, as much for-bidden as to legislate away the life of a natural being. That we have a right to send this corporation to the judiciary, there to undergo its trial and receive its judgment, no one can deny, for so the charter has expressly provided. It is equally clear, I think, that we are to exercise a sound discretion. If we are satisfied that the charter has been so violated as to work a forfeiture, still the question of expediency is open. We may deem it for the public interest to continue its existence, without alteration, to organize, if its organization has been impaired, to propose changes in its structure, or to let it go down, and, if needful, raise up a new institution. We are not bound, even in that case, in the case of a clear and unequivocal forfeiture, to send it to trial and condemnation. Is it not equally plain, that we ought not to send it to trial, if we are satisfied that there has been no forfeiture? Why expose ourselves to the certain consequence of a failure? It will assuredly not increase the public respect for our conduct. We may lose somewhat in the public estimation. Why subject the bank to the destructive effect of a protracted criminal proceeding, when no offence known to the law has been committed? A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) calculating that such a proceeding would not be terminated in less than eighteen months, says, it would give time to wind up the concerns of the corporation, which, he thinks, might be done most advantageously for the stockholders. He takes it for granted, then, that the corporation would be condemned; that a scire facias and conviction are the same thing. But the officers of the corporation will not so consider it; they are not at liberty so to consider it; they must go on and discharge their ordinary functions in the ordinary way, until its doom shall be finally pronounced; and then, and only then, would they be justified in commencing the arrangements that are to follow its dissolution. Till then it is a subsisting corporation, entitled to enjoy all its rights, and bound to perform all its duties. But, let us suppose a more favorable issue. Let us suppose it to be acquitted. Will it pass through the trial unhurt? This artificial being, though it has not precisely the same sort of susceptibility as the natural being, is nevertheless exquisitely susceptible; it may be wounded, dangerously wounded, in its credit. This is its living principle, the source of all its healthy action, upon the preservation of which the capacity to perform its functions mainly depends. There it will be wounded by the mere institution of a criminal proceeding.

It behooves us, then, carefully to examine the ground before we determine to proceed. What, I ask, then, is such a violation of the charter as will work a forfeiture? The report admits that there is a distinction in this respect, and that there may be violations or non-compliances which do not forfeit. It must be so. Every act that is forbidden by any law which it is bound to obey, every failure to do what any such law requires, no matter how minute, or to what cause owing, is a violation or non-compliance with the charter. It surely will not be pretended that every such violation or non-compliance amounts to a forfeiture, no more than that every such act or omission by an individual would merit the punishment of death. The act done may be void, because it is illegal; it may incur a particular penalty, because it is to a certain extent criminal, but it will not therefore amount to a forfeiture—the extreme punishment for extreme offence. What, then, I repeat, is such a violation? In the first place, it is obvious, from the charter itself, (section 7, 23,) that it must be an offence of the corporation. The acts or defaults of officers, servants, or agents, do not necessarily work a forfeiture. Neither is it to be supposed that error, mistake, or even every species of misconduct will cause a forfeiture. It can only be by such departure from, or neglect, or, if you please, violation of, the fundamental and vital laws of its organization, as incapacitates the corporation to perform its duty, or does of itself determine its existence. These offences, if they are so to be termed, can be reached or redressed by no other means. If, for instance, an election had not been held at the time appointed by the eighth section, without the saving provision of that section, there could have been no election at all, and, for want of an integral and vital part of its organization, the corporation would have ceased to exist. The charter itself has made the distinction. In the ninth article of the eleventh section, the corporation is expressly prohibited from dealing, except in certain enumerated articles, and among them is public debt. In the tenth article, it is prohibited from making loans to the United States, or to particular States, beyond a limited amount. It would violate the charter if it were to offend against either of these articles. What then? Is the charter forfeited? No. The twelfth and thirteenth sections establish the sanction for these prohibitions, by providing specific penalties to be inflicted, not upon the corporation, but upon the individual transgressors. In the seventeenth section, also, the penalties are denounced for refusing to pay specie.

To sustain the contrary doctrine, the gentleman from Virginia has quoted and relied upon the famous proceeding, by quo warranto, against the city of London, in the time of Charles II. It is a bad precedent from bad times. Sir, the administration of private justice, in England, between man and man, has for a long time flowed in a clear and steady current. You may generally appeal with safety to the precedents it affords. But, when you come to examine the proceedings in Crown causes, you will err most lamentably unless you are aided by the light of contemporaneous history. Is the gentleman from Virginia acquainted with the character of the precedent he has quoted for our imitation and adoption? I will take the liberty to refer him to the historian for an account of it. It occurred in the year 1683, at a time when the royal prerogative, already most alarmingly extended, was abusing the power it had derived from the circumstances that attended and followed the restoration, to obtain an unlimited ascendancy. To break down and crush the spirit of the city of London, was a favorite and important part of this system. The charges against the city were two. The markets had been destroyed by the fire of 1666, and new ones rebuilt, with many conveniences. To defray the expense, a small tax had been assessed upon goods brought to market. This was the foundation of the first charge. The second and real ground was, that the city of London, always on the side of the liberties of the people, and opposed to the arbitrary extension of the prerogative of the Crown, had addressed the King against the prorogation of Parliament. "The office of judge was at that time held during pleasure, and it was impossible that any cause, where the court bent its force, could ever be carried against it." If the gentleman wishes to know how the pleasure of the Crown was signified in the instance referred to, he may find it in the book he has used, at page —, to the following effect: "Memorandum. That when the demurrer in this case was joined, viz., Mich. Term, 34 Car., 2, Mr. Sergeant Pemberton was Chief Justice of the King's Bench. But, before Hilary Term, that it came to be argued, he was removed, and made Chief Justice of the Common Bench, and Sir Edward Saunders, who had been counsel for the King in drawing and advising the pleadings, was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench." The bloody Jeffries was the next Chief Justice. Does any gentleman still think this a precedent to be offered to our imitation? I will then beg leave to tell him further, that this decision took place in the very year whose annals are stained with the blood of Russell and of Sidney. It is one of the dark and atrocious offences committed by a dependent and corrupted judiciary, under the forms of justice, at the instigation of the Crown, which history has long since consigned to distinguished infamy. It is one of a series of arbitrary and oppressive acts that, rousing the spirit of a brave and injured people, finally expelled the Stuarts from the throne of England, and caused the revolution of 1688. The corporation of London was of course condemned, and the King availed himself of the decision to grant a new charter, which he took care to adapt to his own views, of repressing the spirit of London, and curtailing its liberties. All the corporations of England—all, guilty or innocent, convinced that if the most powerful body of the kingdom had sunk under a contest with a corrupted judiciary, executing the arbitrary wishes of the Crown, resistance on their part would be vain—came in, surrendered their charters, the security of their rights and liberties, and accepted such new charters as the Crown would condescend to give, paying for the privilege of being robbed of their rights such sums of money as the Crown thought proper to exact. The revolution gave independence to the judges. One of the first acts of the Government that succeeded, was to declare this decision illegal and void, (2 W. & M., s. 1, c. 8.) By the judiciary it was never respected; but, in all questions afterwards arising, the old charter was considered as having always continued in force. What is the language of modern and sound authority in England? "A judgment of ouster against mayor and aldermen, does not dissolve a corporation. God forbid," says an English judge, that the rights of the innocent should be lost and destroyed by the offence of individuals. When a corporation exists, capable of discharging its functions, the Crown cannot obtrude a new charter upon them." Thus repudiated and reprobated in England—thus condemned by its history, as well as by its association, are we to adopt this precedent? The violation of charters has ever been deemed an enormous grievance. It was one of our complaints against England, and thought worthy to be introduced into the Declaration of Independence, where it stands enumerated among the solemn causes that led to the separation.

I would beg leave to add further, before I examine the particular offences imputed, that where a violation has taken place, I cannot conceive that it will work a forfeiture, if there be a specific remedy, redress, or penalty. A forfeiture in that case is unnecessary.

I shall touch very briefly upon the several imputed offences contained in the report, not only because I have already trespassed too long, but because the principles I have submitted go far to settle them, and also because they have already been fully and satisfactorily answered by a member of the Committee, (Mr. LOWMEES.)

The first of these charges relates to the two millions of public debt purchased by the bank for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. I think it clear that, in the question with the Treasury, the bank was in the right; and the obvious mode of correcting the error that has occurred, would be to pay to the bank the $54,000 lost by passing the stock to the commissioners at par. But no one, I think, after a moment's reflection, can hesitate to say that there has been no violation of the charter, and every one will admit that, if there had been, the Government could not complain, having been a party, with full knowledge, to the transaction, and enjoyed all the benefit of it. The object of the charter was to prevent the bank from purchasing to keep or to sell—that is to say, purchasing for its own use. It purchased, in this instance, for the Treasury; it passed the stock immediately to the commissioners, and all the peculiarity of the case consists in the single circumstance that it received from the Government $54,000 less than it paid. It is needless to spend time on this item; for, if there has been a violation, there is a remedy for it by the charter, to be enforced under the charter, and not by destroying the charter.

The second imputed violation is what relates to the non-payment of the coin part of the second instalment. There is some apparent confusion upon this subject in the report, and there is one plain mistake. It will be necessary to ascertain the facts accurately, before we attempt to reason upon them. In page 7 of the report it is stated, "that the amount of specie in the bank in February, 1817, was $1,724,109; 324,000 more than the coin part of the first instalment, and which may fairly be presumed to have been received for the second instalment." The inference is, that only $324,000 in coin had been received for the second instalment. This seems to be contradicted by the statement in page 6. The committee there say, "the loans were to be confined to aid the payment of the coin part of the second instalment, on the shares which had been subscribed at the places where offices were then in operation—New York, Boston, and Baltimore." They then add, that the total amount of these loans, at Philadelphia and Baltimore, was $338,250; that at New York and Boston they were "to a very trifling amount, if any;" and that, in other parts of the Union, the coin part of the instalment was paid in coin. The view of the committee would prove, that all the coin part of the second instalment had been paid in coin, excepting about $338,250. We have, however, the clearest proof of the real state of the fact in table V, among the documents.

It appears from that table that, in February, 1817, there were in the vaults of the bank in Philadelphia, Boston, New York, and Baltimore, in specie, exactly what the committee state — — — — — $1,724,109 06

But there were, at the same time, due from the commissioners for receiving subscriptions, $8,559,764 95, the coin part of which must have been received in coin, and would be rather more than 2,000,000 00

Making together — — — 3,724,109 00
The total amount in coin, required for the second and third instalment, was — — — 4,200,000 00

So that the total deficiency arising from discounts at Philadelphia, Boston, New York, and Baltimore, did not exceed — — — 475,991 00
Of which there were in Philadelphia and Baltimore $338,250.

It thus appears that the amount is much less than seems to have been supposed; that it could not have occasioned the necessity of importation "to supply the deficiency the evasion had occasioned;" that it could not have injured the punctual stockholders, nor materially affected the operations of the bank. On the contrary, it may, I think, be assumed as probable, that the mere knowledge of the fact that this accommodation might be obtained kept down the price of specie, and really benefited the stockholders, as well as contributed to bring about the resumption of specie payments.

But, small as it is, there is a much stronger ground of justification. I allude not now to the circumstance that an inquiry was instituted by Congress at the time of these transactions, and they not only escaped censure, but appeared to be approved. That would, and ought to be, an answer here—for Congress might then, by interposing, have arrested the proceeding. But the necessity which then justified it in the sight of Congress still affords it a justification. The bank was bound to go into operation on or before the first Monday in April, 1817. It was the wish of the Government, founded upon the exigencies of the public, that it should commence much sooner; and, yielding to that wish, it did commence, before the second instalment was payable. What were its operations? Receiving deposits, discounting, issuing paper—each of which, to a certain extent, disabled it to enforce the precise literal terms of subscription. They could not refuse to discount for a stockholder, merely because he was a stockholder; they could not refuse to receive their own notes, or checks upon the bank, as equivalent to coin. That would have been absurd—as they were bound to pay coin for them; and would, besides, have been a substantive violation of charter. They might have refused the notes of State banks; yes, they might, but what would have been the consequence? They must have violated the compact that had been entered into, and thrown everything into confusion. I am discussing the matter as if it were established that they did receive the notes of State banks. It does not appear whether they did or not. And, after all, what harm has been done? Is the bank in a worse condition, or the public injured? It cannot be pretended.

The third item of complaint is too small, in itself, to merit much attention. It appears (Documents, page 114) that dividends to the amount of one thousand four hundred and sixty dollars were paid to four stockholders, who had been in default when the dividends were declared. There is an unintentional ambiguity in the mode of stating the charge, in the report, which might induce a belief that the instalment had not been paid at the time of paying the dividend. From the documents it will be seen that the instalment was paid, and that interest was charged upon it from the time when it became payable. The utmost loss that could have been incurred, would have been the difference between four per cent. and three per cent. for six months; equal to three hundred and sixty-five dollars. It was not, perhaps, so much; for the interest was probably charged up to the time of paying the dividend, which was more than six months. Whether these payments were made by mistake, or whether there were any peculiar circumstances to justify them, does not seem to have been inquired into, and cannot be ascertained. But every one must be satisfied, that, whether the payment was intentional, or whether it was by mistake—whether it was right, or whether it was wrong—the consequences cannot extend beyond those who were concerned in it. The money might, perhaps, be recovered back, or the officer be charged with it as a wrongful payment. It can never forfeit the charter.

The only remaining article is that which regards the elections—particularly the first. This charge is, in substance, neither more nor less than that votes were received which the committee believe to have been illegal, and that the judges of the election, and directors and officers of the bank, "perfectly well knew the facts," which, in the opinion of the committee, made them illegal. As there were no directors till after the first election, I do not see how they can be implicated in the charge, so far at least as relates to that election. But, waiving that, and waiving too the inquiry whether the judges had any right to refuse the votes, (a very doubtful matter, to say the least of it,) let us examine the matter a little more closely, with a view, not to its foundation in fact, but to its legal results. I have never understood, nor do I believe, that any number of illegal votes will make an election void. There are circumstances that will undoubtedly avoid an election. If an armed force, of soldiers or others, were to surround the polls, and by violence, or the menace of violence, prevent the electors from voting, or otherwise interfere with the free exercise of their franchise, the election ought to be held void. But the mere circumstance of illegal votes being received, is of no importance, unless the election is contested. And what is then the rule? The chairman of the Committee of Elections will answer that question. Where the election is by ballot, the illegal votes are all deducted from the majority. Suppose there is still a majority, is the election void? No. The highest on the return is the person elected. Suppose there was no opposing candidate, is the election questionable? I believe we have never heard of such a thing. Again, sir, suppose the election not to be tested—the returned member takes his seat, and holds it till his term of service has expired. Is his right afterwards questionable, or the validity of the acts he has done? I have never so understood it. These are the ordinary rules applicable to such cases. How do they apply here? Illegal votes, it is said, were received. Was there any opposition, or were all the votes, legal and illegal, given for the same ticket? Was the election contested? Has not the time for contesting it gone by? Supposing it still open to contest—can any one inform us how many legal and how many illegal votes were given, or what would be the state of the poll if the illegal votes were deducted from the majority? These are matters necessary to be ascertained in the first instance; and until they are ascertained, at all events, the election is good, and the acts done under it valid. Even where an election is contested, the returned candidate takes his seat, and holds it, with all its rights, voting and acting with others, until the contest is decided. But, again; was it ever heard that the mere fact of receiving illegal votes at the election of corporation officers, was a forfeiture of the charter? Every corporation in the United States might tremble if that were the law. No: You may invalidate the election before the proper tribunal—you may set it aside. The judiciary may inquire into it—may expel those who have been introduced by illegal means—may introduce those who have been by illegal means kept out. These are the appropriate and all-sufficient remedies, which we have frequently seen employed, and employed with effect. They apply directly to the evil where it is found—correct that evil—but leave the innocent corporation, and the innocent corporators, in the enjoyment of their rights, which these remedies are intended to preserve, and not to destroy.

I had intended to have noticed the propositions brought forward by the chairman of the committee. It would be unpardonable to consume more of the time of the House. A single remark upon them and I have done. Among those propositions there are several that would be highly advantageous to the bank. If they were offered to its free acceptance, perhaps they would be accepted. But, under the threat of a scire facias, they ought not to receive a moment's consideration.

TUESDAY, February 23.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize William Prout to institute a bill in equity before the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, against the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, and to direct a defence therein," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George M. Brook and Edmund P. Kennedy; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be discharged from the further consideration of all the petitions, memorials, and other matters, to them referred at the present session, upon which they have not acted, and that the same be laid on the table.

The House, on motion of Mr. RICH, reconsidered the vote of yesterday which rejected the bill for the relief of the heirs of William Reed; and the bill was laid on the table.

The engrossed bill supplementary to the act for the relief of Benjamin Wells was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the benefit of William Prout was read the third time, and passed.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill regulating passenger ships and vessels were taken up, and agreed to—one of them with an amendment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to repeal part of an act passed on the 27th day of February, 1813, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment,'" "An act for the benefit of Jacob Purkill;" and "An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor"—in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The House took up the bill to extend the privilege of franking letters, &c., to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House during the recess of Congress.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, by including in its provisions the Speaker of the House.

Mr. GARNETT moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the provisions of the bill freeing from postage letters and packets to and from certain officers of agricultural societies. This motion was lost; and,

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, it was decided in the negative; and the bill of course rejected.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in the chair,) on the subject of the Bank of the United States—Mr. JOHNSON's resolution for repealing the charter being still under consideration.

Mr. SERGEANT concluded the argument which he commenced yesterday—occupying to-day more than two hours in defence of the bank—as given entire in the preceding pages.

Mr. PINDALL again rose. He was (he said) sensible of the attention with which the House had already indulged him in this debate. He would therefore consume but a little more of its time, in replying to some of the grounds which had been occupied with so much skill and address by gentlemen who opposed the resolution for the repeal of the bank charter. The gentlemen from South Carolina and Pennsylvania, (Mr. LOWMEDE and Mr. SERGEANT,) who had displayed so much ability on this occasion, had been unable to discover any fault, not even the most venial sin, in the bank; on the contrary, they find it covered with virtues and perfection, and occupying a station almost superhuman. The gentleman from South Carolina had yielded his applause to the bank, for its disinterested generosity in aiding the credit of the State banks; as an instance of which, the gentleman had quoted the agreement of the 31st January, 1817, with the receiving banks, when he imagines the interest of the institution would have dictated a refusal of that agreement, whereby the notes of the State banks would have been refused at the Treasury, and discredited by the public; so that the National Bank would have succeeded in obtaining the confidence and business of the country. Now, said Mr. P., let it not be forgotten, that, after the receipt of the first instalment, the bank found itself the owner of only $1,800,000 in specie, and that a secret understanding subsisted between the directors and stockholders, whereby the subsequent specie instalments were to be evaded. Whilst I admit, that, if the credit of the State banks could have been totally destroyed, the country would have been forced to turn its confidence and address its business to the National Bank, I insist that the bank was not in a condition to respond to the confidence or business of the country. It would, on the cessation of the currency of State paper, have been involved in the necessity of emanating its notes to supply the vacuum occasioned by the banishment of State paper; and to have ventured on that measure as suddenly as the crisis would have required, must have incurred certain ruin, as it could not have commended the specie to redeem such abundant issues, which would, however, have been speedily returned to it for specie, by the numerous State banks, that must and would have combined against their common enemy.

Had the bank divided and distributed all the specie it possessed, at an early period after its commencement, among its fifteen branches, and issued its paper in the quantities requisite to supply a currency, a few weeks, or indeed days, would have emptied the vault of its last dollar, or obliged it to withhold the payment of specie, and thereby reduced its credit to the level of the State banks. Why, then, is the bank applauded for its forbearance of a rigor to which it never dared to resort, or praised for a moderation to which it was confined by its own delinquency and weakness? To the charge that the bank had resorted to usurious practices, in loaning post notes payable at sixty days, at an interest, as though the money had been immediately advanced, when in fact it would never be advanced by the bank, as the borrower's notes would be payable as soon as the post notes, and that there was no authority to suppress such extortions, the gentleman from South Carolina replies, showing the great convenience of post notes for transmission by mail, in lieu of specie, and the security they afford against losses, as they were not payable to bearer. But I ask, whether this answer should be urged? The bank, on the loan of silver dollars, should only be entitled to the same interest to which others are entitled. Post notes are more convenient than dollars; and if, on account of that convenience, the bank may receive more than legal interest, it may also receive more than legal interest on loans of its own ordinary bank bills, for they, too, are more convenient for transmission than silver. [Here Mr. Lowndes explained, stating that his observations had been applicable to the resolution of the directors of the 30th January, 1817, which only seemed to authorize the advance of post notes at sixty days, when payable at a place other than that at which they were issued.] I am apprized, said Mr. P., of the distinction in this respect, between post notes payable where issued, or at a different place; and that on the latter an additional sum may be required by the bank, equal to the premium on exchange. But I do not concur with the gentleman from South Carolina, in his interpretation of the bank resolution of the 30th January, 1817, nor will I criticise that resolution to find its literal import, for the same bank that made the resolution had, or at least assumed, the right to interpret its own resolution, and, as it appears by the report, did issue post notes payable at the place where issued, and on these post notes did receive an unjust and unlawful gain. The gentleman has not denied, that the post note of $20,000, at sixty days, the loan of which is mentioned in the report, was payable at the place where issued. But, suffer me to yield to the gentleman's construction of the bank resolution of 30th January, 1817, that is to say, that it only warranted the issuing of post notes payable at different places than where issued, and mark the consequences. Then, as we know that such notes payable at the place of issuing, were loaned, there was either some other resolution to warrant these loans, or there was not. If there was another resolution to warrant these loans, that other resolution subjects the bank to every criminal imputation that it would have been subjected to in case the resolution of the 30th January, 1817, had authorized the same same unlawful loans. But if there was no other resolution to authorize such loans, yet, as we know the loans were made, the bank incurred a still greater turpitude by resorting to an illicit practice, and adroitly omitting to spread any resolution or distinct account of it, on the journal of its proceedings; hiding the transactions from the Government, which had reserved the right of examining all its transactions. It is possible I have not understood the object of the gentleman from South Carolina, when on this head he referred to the statement of the cashier. That officer deposes, that post notes were directed to be issued, on application, at sixty days, to be paid for out of the proceeds of discounts, if required. This certainly had a reference or at least was applicable to post notes payable at the same place; they were to be paid for out of the proceeds of discounts, which ought to have been ready money to the borrower, and would of course afford unjust gain to the bank, unless it had directed the borrower's note to bear date at the end of the sixty days, when the post note would be equal to cash, which direction the bank never gave.

The honorable member from South Carolina has shown us the 22d and 23d sections of the act of incorporation. By the 22d section, in case the bank did not commence operations by April, 1817, Congress were authorized, within twelve months, to declare the charter void. But this section certainly does not prove that Congress can under no other circumstances repeal the law. It was inserted as a restraint on the bank, and not as a limitation of legislative authority. It was a penalty denounced in terrorem to hurry the bank to its duties.

The 22d section designates the event on which Congress may annul the charter, and the 23d section, the circumstances under which the court may annul it by judgment. But if we have shown that, without either of these sections, Congress would have possessed power to repeal the act of incorporation, that power is not impaired by either section; for, if either Government or an individual having a right is entitled to a remedy or certain means of justice and thereafter a law be made conferring a new remedy without saying anything of his previous rights, the Government or individual will have his election to pursue the old or new remedy, the latter being considered as cumulative. This proposition is sufficiently evident to all professional gentlemen. If, then, it were possible for the Fourteenth Congress to make a law to bind and govern the Fifteenth Congress, yet it has not attempted to do so by the 22d or 23d sections, which the Government may resort to as a cumulative remedy against abuses of charter, or assert the prior and unimpaired power of repealing the law. Ask me why the 22d section was inserted? I answer, to prompt the bank to an early operation. Ask me why the 23d section of the scire facias was enacted? I answer, to enable the courts to repeal the charter. But, do you ask, why then a power to repeal was not reserved to Congress? The answer is plain. It was unnecessary to give to Congress a power it already possessed. If this Congress does not possess the power under the Constitution, it cannot derive it from the gift or grant of the Fourteenth Congress. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLane) opposes our power to repeal the act of incorporation by deductions from the principles of the common law, which he alleges are applicable in construing the charter. Having myself embraced a view of this question which places me in opposition to that gentleman, it is not my province to warn him of the strong force he must contend with here, in supporting his negative proposition on common law principles only. There are many gentlemen on the floor who think with my colleague (Mr. Johnson) that there is no common law appending to the Federal Government, on the ground that the common law, being different in different States, is not sufficiently uniform for adoption by the General Government, which, extending itself over all the States, finds no common law commensurate with its surface. Although I disapprove of this doctrine, I shall not discuss it, as it is believed that the gentleman from Delaware and myself entertain the same opinion of the application of the common law; but I cannot avoid the remark of the peculiar applicability of the reasons for negating the common law, to the interpretation of this charter, for, if the extension of any measure of the National Government into several States annuls the force of the common law as to that measure, because the common law being different in the respective States, would be productive of conflicting constructions of the same public measure, how can the common law have any application to this charter, which is made to exist in every State of the Union? If this be so, the gentleman will find himself opposed by all who deny the common law. But the gentleman is incorrect in his common law argument, and therefore ought not to have the support of those who subscribe to the force of that law. He admits that every corporation must be subject to some visitatorial authority, and that Congress is the visitor of this bank, as the King, through the King's Bench, or Parliament, is of civil corporations in England. [Mr. McLane explained. He had argued that, if Congress had the visitatorial power, it would not follow that it could not destroy the corporation, but he had not admitted that Congress had the visitatorial power, and he doubted whether it could be said to possess it.] I had mistaken the gentleman, continued Mr. P., and accepting his meaning as now explained, his error remains: he contended that the visitatorial authority could only punish or correct abuses of corporations, and could not destroy them; and instanced the King's Bench, which was the visitor of lay corporations, and yet could not destroy them. The King's Bench, however, can, and frequently does, for sufficient cause, destroy as well as correct the corporate bodies. It corrects by mandamus, and destroys by quo warranto. If, then, Congress has the visitatorial power over the bank, it may, for sufficient cause, repeal the law of incorporation; and that Congress is the visitor, I am convinced, by considerations which I had the honor to submit on Thursday.

The Government of the United States sustains a two-fold capacity in its relations to the bank corporations: first, the Government is a co-partner in trade with the other subscribers, and the owner of 70,000 shares of the capital stock; and, if it stood only in the relation of partner, would be legally as well as morally subject to municipal law equally with the other stockholders. But, secondly, the Government, in its sovereign capacity, cannot be subjected against its will to municipal law; for municipal law is subject to it, and enacted, repealed, or modified, by it. The frequency of forensic debate on the constitutionality of State laws, prepares the minds of gentlemen for the admission of an erroneous principle as regards this Government; for, while the Constitution expressly prohibits any State from the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, it imposes no such inhibition on Congress. Adam Smith, or some other popular writer, informs us that one of the petty sovereigns of Italy entered a partnership with a Jew to keep a wine cellar, and for a division of profits, &c. Had the sovereign refused, on closing the concern, to account according to municipal law, all would exclaim at the injustice, but no one would doubt his power or give the Jew a right to control him by municipal force, which would be in that instance to convert the Jew into the sovereign.

Now, sir, there is something oppressive, something painful, cruel, and almost horrid, in the very idea of a Government being a partner in trade, and at the same time legally exempt from the rules of municipal justice, which usually govern such concerns; nor can you be relieved from this disagreeable idea by seeking to subject sovereignty to the physical and legal force of a municipal law, because it would then cease to be sovereign. Even yet some oppressive wrong seems to haunt the question, or the subject in which the question originates; it is the last. It is wrong, radically wrong in the nature of things, that Government should combine in partnerships of trade with its subjects or citizens, inasmuch as the relations of such concern are controlled by laws, to which the sovereign is not subject. The Government is a partner in trade, may look to distant and enormous speculations, and in its sovereign capacity enact laws to secure the result of such views, and proving too mighty for all competitors, and having enriched the trading company, finds no power on earth of sufficient ability to enforce justice against it, on a settlement of the partnership. My views on this part of the subject must not be misconstrued. I insist that the legislative power may repeal as well as make all laws, including laws of incorporation. And the objection that such a power is susceptible of abuse or perversion is untenable, for that would operate to show that there was no legal, civil, or political capacities, whether Legislative, Executive, or Judicial, as any of them may be perverted. But, having acquired or derived a legal and proper power or jurisdiction over the subject-matter, I then will meet gentlemen in a concurrence, that we are bound by the precepts of justice and morality in the exercise of our powers and jurisdiction. The imprudence of creating or subscribing to the corporation has no weight with me; for, in the exercise of our legitimate powers, we should not by compulsion, but of choice, be governed by the same rules of justice as individuals. The bank charter, if a contract, was entered into freely on the part of Government; and thereby imposed a moral obligation, to which Government will adhere, while that obligation remains. But, when the conditions of the incorporating law are forfeited, and its fundamentals violated, by the party now demanding a performance, as has been done with respect to this charter, I say the moral obligation has ceased to exist.

Gentlemen speak of our destitution of power to repeal the act, alleging that it is a contract; and yet they are willing to pass a law so to modify the charter as to prevent future abuses; but, if we are yet bound by it as a contract, it cannot be modified by Congress. How can Congress, (if these gentlemen reason correctly,) being but one party, modify its contract without the consent of the other party?

The gentlemen from Delaware and Pennsylvania, (Messrs. McLANE and SERGEANT,) who are both opposed to the resolution before us, seem to concur; and yet conflict most strangely with regard to the same source of argument. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in answer to my colleague, (Mr. TYLER,) travelled into the history of the ancient English decisions concerning the violation and forfeiture of charters, for the purpose of showing that those decisions were made in evil times, and under the influence of corrupt motives. The gentleman from Delaware, speaking also in opposition to our resolution, produced and read a modern elementary law book, which he affirmed contained correct principles, and supported his position. Yet, sir, the doctrine, with regard to corporations, found in the modern book of my friend from Delaware, and so highly extolled by him, consists of the same identical principles of the old English decisions, condemned as wicked and corrupt by my friend from Pennsylvania. Not only so, but the old reports which are so corrupt and detestable in the eyes of our opponents, are quoted by the modern writer whom they applaud, as the authority on which he advances the very doctrine of corporations on which they seem to rely.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania quotes a number of circumstances in support of his opinion, that the judgment of the King's bench, in the reign of Charles II., which virtually revoked the charter of incorporation of the city of London, was obtained by political intrigue, and to serve the King, who wanted money, and could get it for a new city charter, in case the old one was revoked. I am unwilling and vexed to find such imputations cast on the ancient common law tribunals of our ancestors. Such charges are not proved or probable. But let the decision, and the report of the case, which is now in this House, speak for themselves. The charter empowered the corporation of the city only to make by-laws, rules, &c., for the government of itself, its officers, and its citizens; but the corporation usurped and exercised the power of imposing taxes on all the subjects of England, and indeed on aliens, and all the inhabitants of the world who should visit the city; in truth, the corporation thereby usurped sovereign authority, claiming, and actually enforcing a power which could only be exercised by the King and Parliament. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks this circumstance so trivial as to be almost innocent, and is so astonished at the decision of its being a violation of the charter, that he can only account for it by the imputation of intrigue and corruption to the English Government and judges. The gentleman has informed us that King Charles II. wanted and received money for a new charter of incorporation of the city. And did the King receive money for a charter? And was this an evidence of corruption? Let the question be answered. The King received money for a charter! and his conduct in this, it seems, we abominate. Now, sir, you may define, turn, examine, and re-examine this money—this price of the charter—as you please, and you will find it was nothing more or less than a bonus—the very thing of which I had the honor to speak when addressing you on Thursday—and only differs from the bonus the speculators of the United States Bank offered and paid to this Government, in this, that this Government agreed to receive a million and an half of dollars as the price of its charter, whereas the King was more moderate, and received a less sum for his charter. Then, the merit or demerit of selling chartered privileges, exists not in the thing itself, but in the personages concerned; thus, it was honorable in this Government to receive a bonus for a charter, but abominable in the English Government to do so.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania insists that no offence of the board of directors, in the management of the bank, can be imputed as a violation of charter, inasmuch as the directors are not the corporation, for the subscribers are the corporation, and that the offence must be by them.

FEBRUARY, 1819.

Bank of the United States.

H. or R.

But how is this? The board of directors are the authorized agents and representatives of the subscribers, and the subscribers, like all other men, are accountable, not only for their own conduct, but for the acts of their agents; hence, by the gentleman's own principles, the board may violate the charter. The board of directors has the sole and exclusive control of the corporation and all its concerns, and if the corporation is not accountable for their actions, there can be no such thing as a violation of charter; the constitution itself could in no shape be reached, and would consequently be superior to all law, and not subject to the Government of the country. Is it possible that the subscribers must receive all the advantages of the management of the board, and abide by none of the disadvantages of that management?

The gentleman from South Carolina apprehends that a dissolution of the bank will involve the Treasury in embarrassments. I acknowledge the Treasury has found its operations in some measure facilitated by the bank; but these aids are not of magnitude, and could be obtained from other sources—for instance, extend to the receiving banks of the States, (and some of them are certainly solvent,) the advantages that have been afforded to the United States Bank, by leaving the public moneys in their vaults, as a capital to deal with, until wanted by the Treasury, which would afford a continual deposit, and would be what is afforded to this bank, and those banks would doubtless agree to pay the moneys in any part of the country; and, as the receiving banks would be in different quarters of the Union, it would not be always necessary for each of them to pay money at the most remote points. Besides this advantage to the National Bank, Government pays it annually $350,000, the interest on the $7,000,000 subscribed to it. But this $350,000 per annum, or part of it, is expected to be refunded in the shape of the Government Bank dividends; and this Government, discarding its own dignity and old-fashioned simplicity, enters the counting-house, and becomes a partner with a company of money changers and speculators, to save a penny to offset against the small wastage of transmitting moneys from place to place within its own limits. Gentlemen treat this important subject as an affair merely between the stockholders and the Treasury, and as if the public were not to complain whilst these other two parties were content. It should, however, be remembered that Congress, having acknowledged its own right to grant bank charters for the public good, granted this charter to a few individuals, with many exclusive privileges, and tied its own hands from granting, or shut the people's mouths from asking any other charter for twenty years, on the ground that this exclusive charter would enable its possessors to afford the country, as well as the Treasury, facilities and comforts to which they had before been strangers. And now, when the people find themselves disappointed, and inquire of their Representatives for the recompense they were to receive for the grant of these exclusive privileges, at the expense of their common rights, they are to be informed that their importunities are idle; that they have no concern with the subject, and that none are to inquire of it but the Treasury Department, and the stockholders, bank directors, brokers, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, succinctly stated the reasons which would induce him to vote for the resolution to repeal the charter.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, briefly replied to Mr. BARBOUR; when the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the compensation of the surveyor of the port of Patuxent, in Rhode Island," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to designate the boundaries of districts, and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Ohio and Indiana," reported the same with an amendment; which was read, agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the same committee, to whom was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting the location of certain sections of land to be granted for the seat of government in the State of Indiana," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the purchase of live-oak timber for naval purposes," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill authorizing the purchase of live-oak timber for building small vessels of war.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to reduce the duties on certain wines, and to declare free of duty books printed in foreign languages, were discharged, and the bill was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, the President of the United States was requested to cause to be laid before this House, at the next session of Congress, any information which may be in his power, touching the causes of the imprisonment of — White, an American citizen, at Buenos Ayres.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Jacob Purkill; An act to repeal part of an act passed on the 27th day of February, 1813, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment;" and, An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale or to be held to labor, were severally read twice, and referred; the first, to the Committee of Claims; the second, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and the third, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George M. Brook and Edmund P. Kennedy," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1819," with amendments. They have also passed bills and a resolution of the following titles, to wit: An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department; An act in addition to "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases;" An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy; and, a resolution requesting the President of the United States to employ an artist to ascertain the latitude of 36 degrees 30 minutes north, on the west bank of Tennessee river; in which amendments, bills and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

LONGITUDE OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d November last, the memorial of William Lambert, made a report, accompanied with a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause astronomical observations to be made, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol, in the City of Washington, from some known meridian in Europe; which said resolution was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow. The report is as follows:

That the subject of a first meridian for the United States was presented by the memorialist to the consideration of Congress in the month of December, 1809, on which a select committee of this House made a report on the 28th of March, 1810. The memorial and other papers relating to it were afterwards referred to the Secretary of State, who also reported favorably thereon, but no decision of Congress had yet been had. In the present case, the committee have attentively examined the subject; and, to enable them more fully to satisfy themselves of the accuracy of the calculations, they have made application to, and received the opinions in writing of, scientific gentlemen, in different parts of the United States, which accompany this report. It rests with Congress to determine on the utility of establishing a first meridian, in conformity to the practice of most, if not all, of the commercial nations of Europe, which appear to have considered the object of sufficient importance not only to authorize observatories to be erected, and furnished with suitable instruments and other apparatus, at the Seats of Government, or some other convenient places within their respective dominions, but as an appendage of sovereignty, which they are not disposed to relinquish.

The committee believe that if a general meridian could be fixed, by the consent of all Powers materially interested in the pursuits of commerce and navigation, it would be attended with advantages which the establishment of many meridians would not afford.

But this desirable coincidence in opinion and practice is not within our control, and probably never will take place.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that it would tend to the promotion of science and national credit to fix a first meridian for the United States somewhere within their territories; and as the Capitol was originally contemplated by the plan of the City of Washington for that purpose, it may be proper to select it, or some convenient place in its vicinity.

The committee will not take upon themselves to recommend that an observatory be erected, but they deem it advisable to comply so far with the request of the memorialist as to submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to cause such number of astronomical observations to be made, by methods which may in his judgment be best adapted to insure a correct determination of the longitude of the Capitol, in the City of Washington, from Greenwich or some other known meridian in Europe; and that the data, with accurate calculations, or statements founded thereon, be laid before Congress at their next session.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of the Bank of the United States—

Mr. SPENCER rose and spoke more than four hours in defence of the report of the Bank Committee.

Mr. WALKER, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Chairman, like my friend from Virginia, last up upon this question, I merely want to give briefly my reasons for my vote. I have heard much said about the correct and incorrect management of the bank, and of the expediency and inexpediency of its measures; but, sir, upon all occasions of this nature my inquiries are directed to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the institution—of its moral or immoral tendency. And, sir, I do think that the President and Directors of the United States Bank deserve my thanks, not for their correct management of the public funds; no, sir, but for their prompt and decisive manner of giving to their country, at one view, almost their tether's length of venality and corruption, to which their measures must inevitably tend, and thereby enabling me decisively to determine the side I ought to take upon the question now before us. I can no longer doubt that the United States Bank is an engine of favoritism—of stock-jobbing—of creating and attaching additional consequence to cash, already too powerful—of depressing merit, and giving to money virtue's true reward; and, what I hate, if possible, worse than that, of coupling the destiny of this fair Republic to a detested monarchy—of binding in adamant chains the blessed, innocent lambs of America to accursed, corrupt European tigers. Yes, sir, the president and directors of the Bank of the United States have convinced me that all banking systems have a direct tendency to depress the indigent and necessitous, and add to wealth affluence—to affluence, power and domination; and this tendency, being in direct hostility to the principles of equality, and in support of those principles we know that the bland bosom of the land of our fathers has been bathed in our fathers' blood. You know, sir, that our fathers—nay, some of us, have fought and bled to make our country free, and permanently establish the principles of impartial equality. With this view of the subject how can I hesitate?

Much, to be sure, has been said about commerce. Is commerce to be seriously affected by a revocation of the charter? If so, I am sorry for it. Fair and honorable commerce is useful to the nation. But, sir, shall we refrain from the curtailment of a commerce which is well known to press hard upon the sacred plant of liberty? What said our fathers, in our Revolutionary war, of the comparative value of wealth to equality? I remember to have heard the fathers of three honorable Virginia gentlemen, now of this House, when advised by what is called a prudent, cautious, mercantile man, not to lavish their ample fortunes on the American contest, unhesitatingly reply: If the expenditure of all my fortune will be instrumental to the liberty of my country, thankfully shall it go, and then I shall leave my children an inheritance more truly valuable than all the wealth of Chili, Mexico, and Peru; and such were the sentiments of the patriots of that day. Oh, Nelson! * never will this poor old soldier forget thy benevolence: that very coat thy patriotic charity bestowed, he had on his knapsack-galled back when the good Marquis de Lafayette thus accosted him: "My little soldier, had you ever the small pox?" He said, "No." The Marquis said, "You are then unfit for the purpose I wanted you for." The soldier replied, "The small-pox cannot hurt me when executing the orders of my General." I will not tell what the Marquis said upon that occasion; but I will most positively assert that I would not take (old as I am, and as many children as I have) one hundred shares in the United States Bank for it. I hope this honorable Committee will not take my mention of this little matter as an evidence of my vanity; for I really intended it as an apology to the cool, dispassionate, calculating gentlemen on the other side of the question, for my unwillingness to exchange the sentiments of Henry for the feelings of Hook, † or even Jamy Cowan.

* General Thomas Nelson, of Yorktown, Virginia, sacrificed a large fortune in furnishing soldiers with equipments necessary for their active service.

† The Marquis de Lafayette, when following the British army from Richmond, Virginia, to York, encamped some days in Massay's old field, with expectation that the enemy might give him battle. He there requested General Robert Lawson to send him an officer to execute a secret order. Upon that occasion the conversation passed between the young soldier and his General. The small-pox was in Richmond.

‡ See Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry. Hook, a tory, brought suit against Venable, for impressing beef. Cowan his attorney; Henry for defendant.

I never shall forget the feelings I had when a poor, unprotected orphan boy; and, therefore, hope the vote that we may give upon this occasion may keep the patriot soldier's son from wishing his gallant father had been a tape-seller, or a stock-jobber, instead of a meritorious soldier. We cannot stop this overwhelming influence of money. Captain Henry, who got $50,000 for betraying his master's secrets, will stand as high in public estimation as Thomas Nelson, or old Benjamin Harrison, * who spent, each of them, at least $50,000 in their country's cause, without a hope of remuneration.

I will now say a little to my Virginia friends about State rights. It was but the other day that the whole country, from the extreme south line of Pennsylvania to the Ohio river, down that river to its mouth, up the Mississippi to its head, and all the country south and west of those boundaries, was in a blaze, about the destiny of negroes that may be hereafter born. And why? Because the South and West members thought, and I think rightfully, too—indeed I know it—that the East and North members were infringing on their State rights, and wished to legislate upon property exclusively belonging to the South and West. Where is now fled our flaming zeal for sacred State rights? It cannot be smothered in bank paper. Here is a proper occasion to bring it forth. What are we about to do this day? Can we say our State rights are not endangered by the United States Bank? Have we not got reasons to believe, from the known complexion of a majority of the members of the United States Supreme Court, that that court will determine that the United States Bank have a right to extend her branches over every individual State in the Union, and that the States have no right to prune them? This fact I do know, that, if an unwelcome guest was palmed upon me, I should think my individual rights a little trespassed upon if I could not at least charge him for his accommodation. When we were borrowing money from old England to put our mammoth bank in motion, strange to me that we did not think of the condition of the thousands of poor, miserable British slaves, who, long before this, would have broke their chains had they not have been riveted by the baneful influence of the banks. I wished to have said more upon this subject; but, knowing that in historical and bank knowledge I am far beneath those gentlemen who have gone before me, or may follow after, I shall submissively decline all further observations.

The question was then taken on the resolution offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,' passed April 10, 1816."

And decided in the negative—yeas 23.

After the proposition to repeal the charter had passed in the negative, the Chair announced the scire facias as the next subject in order before the Committee.

Mr. TRIMBLE said that he had only risen to ask the question to be taken. As he had offered this resolution directing a scire facias to issue, it was, perhaps, a duty which he owed to himself to explain his views and discuss the whole subject at large. He was prepared, he said, to do so, but at this late day of the session, and late hour of the day, it would be unpardonable in him to intrude himself upon their patience; more especially, too, when it is manifest that the House is anxious to get forward, and despatch business in relation to public service which could not be pre-terminated.

This, he said, was the first time it had become his duty to vote upon the banking power, and, as the constitutional question is involved in the propositions, he ought, in justice to himself, state distinctly the opinion which would govern his vote, and for that purpose only, he would crave from the Committee a momentary indulgence.

He had just voted, he said, to repeal the charter, because it was his fixed and settled opinion that there was no power in the Constitution under which Congress could create the corporation. The distinction between express and implied powers was well understood, and the principles used as auxiliaries to assist in expounding the instrument had been agreed on all sides. He had searched, he said, in vain for an express banking power in the Constitution. It was not to be found. Many explorers had preceded him in quest of that power, but no one had returned with the discovery. The express powers are well defined, and yet doubts had arisen as to the extent of some of them. For instance, it is declared in the Constitution that "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads," and yet it is contended that Congress has no power to construct a post road. Now, if it was in like manner declared that Congress shall have power to establish banks and banking houses, no one would be hardy enough to contest the existence of the banking power; and conversely, if doubts may fairly arise upon the post road power, under the clause recited, the same principles and course of reasoning which start the doubt will lead to the inevitable conclusion that the banking power does not exist. In his opinion, the power to construct post roads was clearly and expressly given, and it was equally clear to him that the banking power is not expressly granted. Was it to be found among the implied powers—that is to say, implied powers, necessary and proper to carry express powers into full effect and operation? He had pondered, he said, upon this subject not a little. He had attempted again and again to locate this implied banking power upon some one of the express powers; he had put in requisition all the auxiliary principles usually employed in expounding the Constitution, and had passed a strict and rigid inquest upon all its sections, and had been totally unable to find any section, clause, or article, upon which he could anchor this banking power.

He had finally concluded that it was not to be found in the family of implied powers, and under that conclusion he had just voted to revoke the charter, and would now vote for the resolution to order a scire facias. Laboring, as he did, under those convictions, it was impossible for him to vote in favor of the bank; and therefore, it was unnecessary for him to make up or express any opinion upon the questions of forfeiture. He had no doubt of the power of Congress to repeal an unconstitutional law, and he believed this to be such a law. The object he had in view would be attained if the Supreme Court should decree a forfeiture and dissolve the corporation.

He did not intend, he said, to delay the Committee one moment to hear remarks from him upon the various points which had been debated. The States, the Union itself, might be considered a corporation, and it is manifest that the great interests of the community are paramount to all banking interests. Banks are a kind of labor-saving machines that should cease to exist the moment they cease to be useful. How far the United States Bank has performed the great objects and purposes which have been assigned to it, is known to all of us; how far it will be able to perform them in future, time will determine. If it shall fail in attaining its objects, and that failure shall be traced to the mismanagement of the directors, there will always exist a disposition to correct abuses and restore confidence; but if the bank itself has been incurably crippled and maimed, the sooner it is voted out of the country the better. It was created to assist the fiscal operations of the Treasury, and to restore specie payments. The gentleman from South Carolina says that it has effected these objects—and so it has. But it is under an engagement with the public to continue those services to the end of the charter; and a promise had been given that it would equalize exchange and check the issues of local paper. Can it do this? Has it retained the ability to meet the public expectation? If it has not, will its disability originate in its waiver of the second instalment? Will it languish for years as the Bank of England did, because it pre-empted the specie payment of the second quota of stock? Is it a salvo for all the evils of excessive banking, or will it only protract the crises to make the agony more painful? Here several questions cast up for discussion, and succeed each other, embracing a variety of facts and calculations, and opening a wide field of inquiry. If he had found a favorable moment to claim the floor, he would have made an effort to present the subject in new aspects and relations. He would have felt some pleasure in doing so, but he would not forfeit his claims to the indulgence of the Committee by surprising them into a renewal of the debate; and, therefore, would only intimate his conviction that, unless the directors of the bank shall make a radical change in the administration of its concerns, we shall meet here next session under a derangement and depreciation of the paper currency heretofore unknown in this Union. He hoped he might be mistaken, but his prediction was founded on facts, and the results of long experience.

The question was then put on the resolution offered by Mr. TRIMBLE, to issue a scire facias, and decided in the negative—ayes 28.

The resolutions offered by Mr. SPENCER, and also referred to this Committee, were withdrawn by him; and

The Committee took up the bill reported by the bank committee, to enforce the act of incorporation by prohibiting the pretended distribution of shares for the purposes of undue influence in the elections of directors.

Mr. SPENCER proposed various amendments, intended to render the provisions of the bill more effectual; all of which were agreed to.

Mr. BASSETT then moved two amendments; the first, substantially, to compel the bank to redeem all its notes with specie, at whatever branch they might be presented for payment. The object of the second amendment was to prohibit any director of the bank, while acting as such, from dealing in the stock of the bank. Both propositions were negatived by very large majorities; and the Committee of the Whole then rose, and reported their proceedings to the House; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 25.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provisions for the sale of the public lands," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was laid on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, memorials, and other subjects to them referred at the present session, upon which they have not acted, and that the same be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the House, of the 22d instant, requiring information whether any, and, if any, what part of the balances from the State banks, to the Bank of the United States, under the second article of the compact between them, for which balances the Bank of the United States was to receive interest, were retained by the Bank of the United States as special deposits; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to another resolution of the 22d instant, requiring information whether any, and, if any, what part of the balances transferred from the Treasury, to the Bank of the United States, under the second proposition of its agreement with the receiving banks, of the 31st of January, 1817, were drawn from the Bank of the United States, by any department of Government, between the 31st January and 1st July, 1817, exclusive of the sums required by the Treasury, under the exception contained in the second proposition; which letter was read, and also ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal part of an act passed on the 27th day of February, 1813, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment,'" reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which were referred bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Samuel Ward, and An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Nicholas Vreeland, deceased, reported the said bills without amendment, and they were respectively committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1819," were read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department; An act in addition to "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases;" An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy; and, An act to continue in force for a further term the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for other purposes," were severally read twice, and referred; the first and second, to the Committee of Ways and Means; the third, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the fourth, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The resolution from the Senate, "requesting the President to employ an artist to ascertain the latitude of 36 degrees 30 minutes north, on the west bank of the Tennessee river," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to designate the boundaries of districts and establish land offices, for the disposal of the public lands, not heretofore offered for sale, in the States of Ohio and Indiana," was read a third time, as amended; and being on its passage, Mr. STROTHER moved that the said bill be laid upon the table; which motion was rejected; and the question being taken, Shall the said bill pass? it passed in the affirmative.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting the location of certain lands to be granted for the seat of government in the State of Indiana," was also read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed "Resolution requesting the President of the United States to cause astronomical observations to be made to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol in the City of Washington, from some known meridian in Europe," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to diminish the duty on certain wines, and to declare free of duty books printed in foreign languages, was taken up, amended, and ordered to a third reading.

The House went into Committee, on the bill making appropriations for the Public Buildings. Various amendments were made to the bill; and it was finally reported to the House, filled up as follows:

For erecting the centre building of the Capitol, $136,644.

For finishing the gates, the iron railing, and the enclosure north of the President's House, $5,344.

For enlarging the offices west of the President's House, $8,127.

For purchasing a lot of land, and for constructing pipes, for supplying the Executive Offices and President's House with water, $9,125.

Thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille; an act for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain; an act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslande; an act for the relief of Joseph McNeil; an act for the relief of Eli Hart; an act for the relief of Nathan G. Birdseye and Daniel Booth; an act for the relief of John Rodriguez; an act for the relief of Joseph Dozet and Antoine Bourgoud; and an act to regulate and fix the salaries and compensation of the registers and receivers of public moneys in the land offices; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made yesterday, on several subjects referred to it in relation to the Bank of the United States; when,

Mr. SPENCER withdrew his motion to lay the said report upon the table.

The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to repeal the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,' approved April 10, 1816."

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Anderson of Kentucky, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boss, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Claggett, Cobb, Colston, Comstock, Crafts, Cruger, Cushman, Daffington, Davidson, Earle, Ervin of S. Nelson, Patterson, Pegram, Pindall, Seybert, Trimble, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams, of New York.

The question was then taken, also, to concur with the Committee of the Whole, in their disagreement to the resolution submitted by Mr. TRIMBLE, in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Attorney General of the United States, in conjunction with the District Attorney of the State of Pennsylvania, shall immediately cause a scire facias to be issued, according to the 23d section of the 'Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,' calling on the corporation created by the said act to show cause wherefore the charter thereby granted shall not be declared forfeited; and that it shall be the duty of the said officers to cause such proceedings to be had in the premises as shall be necessary to obtain a final judgment thereon; for the expenses of which Congress will hereafter provide."

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Allen, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Bateman, Bayley, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boss, Bryan, Claggett, Cobb, Colston, Comstock, Crafts, Cruger, Cushman, Daffington, Davidson, Earle, Edwards, Fisher, Folger, Fuller, Gage, Garnett, Gilbert, Hale, Herkimer, Holmes, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Lewis, Lincoln, Linn, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Del., W. So the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in rejecting both resolutions.

The House then took up the amendments reported by the committee to the bill "to enforce those provisions of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, which relate to the right of voting for directors."

Mr. STORRS moved that the said bill and amendments lie on the table; which was rejected.

And a motion was made by Mr. PINDALL to refer the said bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to amend the same by additional sections:

First, To prohibit the offence of usury, and to declare the punishment thereof, when committed by the Bank of the United States or its branches, or by the directors, officers, or agents thereof, whilst employed for, or on behalf of the bank, and to prescribe the mode of prosecution for such offence.

Secondly, To prohibit the establishment or continuance by the said bank, of any office of discount or deposit, in any State, after the first day of February, in the year 1820, unless by the consent of the Legislature of such State.

The question being stated to agree to the reference of the said bill with the instructions above, Mr. HARRISON moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was rejected.

And the question was taken to agree to the motion submitted by Mr. PINDALL; and determined in the negative.

The question then recurred on the first amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to which Mr. SPENCER moved an amendment; when,

Mr. BALDWIN moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which was again rejected; and the amendment moved by Mr. SPENCER was agreed to.

The first amendment to the said bill being further amended, was agreed to as amended; and the residue of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole were also agreed to with amendments.

A motion was made by Mr. STORRS further to amend the said bill, by striking out from the first section thereof these words: "and that, in voting at this election, I shall not in any manner violate the first fundamental article of the 'Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'" This motion was rejected; when,

Mr. TERRY moved to amend the first section by striking out these words: "that I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in the shares upon which I shall vote in this election, as attorney for others; that those shares are, to the best of my knowledge and belief, truly and in good faith, owned by the persons in whose names they now stand; and that in voting at this election, I shall not in any manner violate the first fundamental article of the 'Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,'" and in lieu thereof, to insert: "that I have not transferred, nor procured to be transferred, the shares upon which I shall vote at this election as attorney for others, to the persons in whose names such shares now stand, nor were the same subscribed in the name of such persons, for the purpose or with the intent to increase the number of votes which I am entitled by law to give; according to my best knowledge and belief, such persons are, bona fide, owners of such shares, or have an interest therein."

Mr. HARRISON again moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which motion was again rejected.

And the question was then taken, to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. TERRY; and determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, further to amend the said bill, by adding thereto the following, as the fourth section thereof:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, directly or indirectly, give any sum or sums of money, or any other bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, contract, obligation, or security, for the payment or delivery of any money, present, or reward, or anything to obtain or procure the opinion, vote, or interest of the President of the Bank of the United States, or either of the Directors thereof, or the president or a director of either of the branches of the said bank, in any election, question, matter, or thing, which shall come before the said president and directors for decision, in relation to the interest and management of the said bank, and shall be thereof convicted, such person or persons, so giving, promising, contracting, or securing to be given, paid, or delivered, any sum or sums of money, present, reward, or other bribe, as aforesaid, and the president or director who shall in anywise accept or receive the same, on conviction thereof, shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and shall be forever disqualified to hold any office of trust or profit under the said corporation, and shall also forever be disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States.

And the question being taken to agree to the said section, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bayley, Beecher, Bennett, Bloomfield, Blount, Boss, Bryan, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cobb, Crawford, Cruger, Davidson, Desha, Garnett, Gilbert, Hale, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hendricks, Herrick, Hitchcock, Hogg, Hostetter, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Jones, Kinsey, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Illinois, W. A motion was made by Mr. POINDEXTER to add to the said bill the following, viz:

"That this act shall commence and be in force when the same shall have been assented to by a majority of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States."

Which motion was rejected.

And the question was then taken, Shall the said bill be engrossed and read a third time? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 38, as follows:

Smith, Southard, Strother, Terrell, Terry, Westerlo, and Williams of Connecticut.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 26.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred bills of the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: "An act to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy;" and "An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor," reported the same without amendment. The former of the said bills, was ordered to be read a third time to-day, and the latter to lie on the table.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Gabriel Godfroy," made a report recommending that the said bill be rejected. The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RICH, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan Ford," reported the same with amendments, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of James Warren, an officer in the naval service of the Revolutionary war; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the better organization of the Treasury Department," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties," without amendment, and the bill was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions submitted by him on the subject of the Bank of the United States, and the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill for 1819.

These amendments, with one exception, were concurred in, after a long discussion, and reported to the House.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILKIN in the chair, on the bill to alter and establish certain post roads, and spent much time in disposing of the numerous amendments offered, as is usually the case, to this bill.

Before the bill was gone through, Mr. HUGH NELSON took occasion to express his disapprobation of the unlimited and unrestricted admission of propositions for post roads, to an extent which the whole Treasury of the nation would be unable to pay the expenses of, &c.

The Committee having risen and reported the bill, all the amendments were agreed to, with the exception of that which authorized a post route from Fort Wayne to Chicago, which was disagreed to; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enforce for a further term the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for other purposes,'" reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

FEBRUARY, 1819.

Military Academy—Public Printing.

H. OF R.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the establishment of a provisional government in the Territory of Florida, ceded to the United States by the late treaty with Spain, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. ROBERT MOORE,
Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to inquire whether, in his opinion, the public service will require any, and what, aid from the United States, for removing the obstructions occasioned by the sand bar at the entrance of the harbor of Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania, and make report at the next session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. HUGH NELSON,
Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be authorized and directed to make the same allowance for extra service to each person serving this House as was granted at the end of the last session.

Mr. ROBERT MOORE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inquire whether the public interests of the United States will be promoted by subscribing for — shares of stock in the turnpike road leading from the city of Pittsburg to the town of Waterford, in the State of Pennsylvania, and make report thereon at the next session of Congress.

The said resolution was read, and the question being taken to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille; an act for the relief of Lewis H. Guerlain; an act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslandes; an act for the relief of Joseph McNeil; an act for the relief of Eli Hart; an act for the relief of John Rodriguez; an act for the relief of Joseph Dozet and Antoine Bourgoud; an act for the relief of Nathan G. Birdseye and Daniel Booth; and an act to regulate and fix the salaries and compensation of the registers and receivers of public moneys of the land offices, were severally read the first and second time, and referred—the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh to the Committee of Claims; the eighth to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the ninth to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act to continue in force for a further term the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indians, and for other purposes;" an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy; and an act to repeal part of an act passed on the 27th day of February, 1813, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the post office establishment," were severally read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to reduce the duties on certain wines, and to declare free of duty books printed in foreign languages, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act to reduce the duties on certain wines."

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings, for the purchase of a lot of land, and for furnishing a supply of water for the use of certain public buildings," was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. RICH, having obtained the floor, remarked that he rose for the purpose of submitting a motion, the object of which was to call upon the Secretary of War for information, to be communicated at the next session of Congress, in relation to the Military Academy. He said he had been induced to submit the motion from a belief that, either in the organization of the government of the Academy, or in the administration of it, there were some defects; and from a further belief that Congress were not possessed of the information necessary to enable it to judge whether the country received a fair equivalent for the large expenditures which were annually made upon that institution. He then submitted the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, a copy of such rules and regulations as shall have been adopted for the government of the Military Academy; together with a list of the cadets which were attached to the academy on the first day of January, 1816, and of such as shall have been appointed between the said 1st of January and 30th September, 1819; exhibiting the date of their several appointments, with the States and Territories from whence they came; a list of such as shall have resigned or shall have been dismissed, and at what period; also, a list of such as shall have been commissioned in the army, with the date of their commissions, and of such as shall have resigned, with the date of their resignations.

Resolved, also, That the said Secretary be instructed to report as aforesaid, whether any, and, if any, what legislative provisions are necessary for the more convenient organization and government of the said academy, the better to insure a strict obedience to all proper orders, and a suitable respect for all the rights of those whose duty it may be to yield obedience.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Joint Committee on the subject of the public printing. The said report was read, in which is contained the following proposition:

"III. Under all circumstances, the committee have deemed it their duty to recommend that a tariff of prices for every kind of printing required to be done for Congress, be fixed by a joint resolution of the two Houses, to continue in force for two years; and that before the close of the present session, each House make choice, by ballot, of a printer, to execute its own work during the next Congress. The prices should be adequate to the employment of sufficient capital and workmen to perform the work expeditiously, and to insure such care and attention as shall give it such a degree of accuracy and elegance as shall not dishonor the literature and typography of the country. With former contracts before us, and with the professional knowledge which may be called in aid, no difficulty would occur in forming the tariff alluded to, on principles at once liberal to the printer and advantageous to Congress; and in the selection of its printer, each House would doubtless take especial care to choose a man of capacity, probity, and responsibility. In addition to the bond and security to be required of them for the faithful performance of their obligations, a provision might be added, that in case of any unreasonable delay, another person might be employed to do the work, at such prices as the Secretary or Clerk might be able to get it done for, and that the public printers should respectively be responsible for any difference between the sum allowed them and that which it might be necessary to give him. The committee therefore submit the following resolution:

The resolution submitted in the said report being also read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Public Printing be instructed to report a resolution for carrying the foregoing proposition into effect.

The question was then taken to concur in the said resolution, and passed in the affirmative.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The engrossed bill to enforce the provisions of the charter of the Bank of the United States, so far as relates to the election of directors, was read the third time.

Mr. STORRS moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out the provision inserted yesterday on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, making equal the offer to or acceptance of a bribe by any officer of the bank or any of its branches.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, opposed this motion, and justified the clause in question, by referring to the act which provided a similar guard to the purity of the Chief Justice and Judges of the Supreme Court, the terms of which act he quoted, and had copied them in the amendment to the present bill. There was, he argued, at least as much necessity for providing against corruption in this institution as in the Judges of the Supreme Court, and he trusted the amendment would be retained.

The motion to recommit was withdrawn; and the bill was then passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Ordered, That the title be amended by adding the words, "and for other purposes;" and that the Clerk carry the three last mentioned bills to the Senate, and ask their concurrence therein.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SIMKINS, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in the chair,) on the resolution from the Senate proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so far as to make uniform the mode of electing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and Representatives to Congress.

Mr. SIMKINS offered a few remarks in favor of the resolution, and of acting on it definitively, as it had passed one branch of the Legislature, and been so long before the public that every mind was made up, and could decide on it without a protracted debate.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, prefacing his motion with a few remarks in its support, proposed to amend the resolution so as to apportion the number of Electors of each State to the number of Representatives alone, and not to the number of Senators and Representatives of each State.

Mr. COBB spoke against taking up a subject of such great importance at this late period of the session; and hoped the Committee would rise and lay the resolution by.

Mr. TALLMADGE offered a few remarks, chiefly against the amendment proposed by Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, opposed acting on a proposition, at this late hour, which went to change, in a great degree, the frame of our Government; and entered into a brief view of the effects of the resolution. In the course of his remarks he referred to a further amendment which it was the intention of Mr. TUCKER to offer, providing that, in the event of the election of the President devolving on the House of Representatives, according to the provisions of the Constitution, the election shall be determined by plurality of votes, instead of plurality of States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, replied to Mr. BARBOUR, speaking briefly in favor of the resolution, and of acting on it immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR, to get rid of a subject which there was not now time properly to consider, and to which he was also opposed, moved that the Committee rise. The motion was lost—yeas 66, nays 66—the Chairman voting in the negative.

Mr. HOLMES spoke a short time against the amendment, which meant to weaken the influence of the small States, in the event of the Presidential election having to be decided by the House, which he was opposed to, although from a large State himself.

Mr. TUCKER supported his amendment by a few observations; and concluded by renewing the motion for the Committee to rise; which motion was carried, and, after discharging the Committee from the further consideration of the subject—

Mr. TAYLOR moved to lay the amendment on the table; which motion was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays: Yeas 79, nays 73, as follows:

SATURDAY, February 27.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of William Jackson, solicitor on behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, praying that the report of the select committee, made at the present session, in behalf of his suffering constituents, may be called up and finally acted upon.—Laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill providing compensation to assessors in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Eli Hart," made a report recommending the rejection of the said bill. The bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. RICH, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Dozet and Antoine Bourgoud," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. RICH, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Purkill," made a report recommending that the said bill be postponed indefinitely. This bill was also committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act explanatory of the act, entitled 'An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri,' with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, the Secretary of the Treasury was requested to inform this House, what sums of money have been paid to the Attorney General of the United States, for extra services, designating the services and the fund from which the money has been paid.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill confirming certain claims to land in the Territory of Illinois were discharged.

The House then proceeded to consider the said bill, and ordered the same to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The treaty of amity, settlement, and limits between the United States and His Catholic Majesty having been on the part of the United States ratified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, copies of it are now transmitted to Congress. As the ratification on the part of Spain may be expected to take place during the recess of Congress, I recommend to their consideration the adoption of such Legislative measures, contingent upon the event of the exchange of the ratifications, as may be necessary or expedient for carrying the treaty into effect, in the interval between the sessions, and until Congress at their next session may see fit to make further provision on that subject.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26, 1819.

The Message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and permission given to the committee to sit during the sittings of the House.

The engrossed bill to alter and establish certain post roads was read the third time, and passed.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act explanatory of the act, entitled 'An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana, and Territory of Missouri,'" were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," were read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act concerning invalid pensions," and "An act for the relief of Robert McCalla and Matthew H. Jouett," with amendments to each. They disagree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to designate the boundaries of districts and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Ohio and Indiana;" and they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act authorizing the purchase of fire engines and for building houses for the safekeeping of the same; an act for the relief of Solomon Prevost; an act for the relief of Bartholomew Duverge; an act for the relief of John Pettet; an act for the relief of John Anderson; an act for the relief of Alexander Milne; and an act for the relief of Christopher Fowler; in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act authorizing the purchase of fire engines, and for building houses for the safekeeping of the same; an act for the relief of Solomon Prevost; an act for the relief of Bartholomew Duyerge; an act for the relief of John Pettet; an act for the relief of John Anderson; an act for the relief of Alexander Milne; and an act for the relief of Christopher Fowler; were severally read the first and second time, and referred, the first and fifth to Committees of the Whole on Monday next; the second, third, fourth, and sixth to the Committee of Claims, and the seventh to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Robert McCalla and Matthew H. Jouett," was read and concurred in by the House.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, notifying their disagreement to the amendment of this House to their bill, entitled "An act to designate the boundaries of districts and establish land offices for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Ohio and Indiana;" and the said amendment being again read, whereupon it was resolved that this House recede from their said amendment.

The bill for erecting a light-house on Galloo island, &c., passed through a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. PITKIN in the chair,) received some amendments on the motion of Mr. NEWTON, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bills for the relief of James Orr and of Robert Kidd, and John McCausland, passed through a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. A. SMYTH in the chair;) and the bill extending the term of half pay pensions to the widows and children of certain officers, and seamen, and marines, who died in the public service; and the bill for the relief of B. and P. Jourdan, passed through Committees of the Whole, (Mr. TALLMADGE in the chair;) all of which bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the last named was read the third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," reported their agreement to the said amendments. The amendments were then read and concurred in by the House.

Mr. HOLMES, from that Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill, authorizing the President of the United States to take possession of West Florida, for the transportation thence of the East and Spanish authorities, and providing for the temporary government of the Territory, &c., which was twice read.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill, and concurred in all except that which was disagreed to by the Committee of the Whole yesterday, and so reported to the House. This amendment was an appropriation of four thousand three hundred dollars, to be repaid to the owners of the British vessel Lord Nelson, which was captured on Lake Ontario, twelve days before the declaration of the late war, brought in and sold by agreement, and the moneys placed in the hands of the court; the capture was afterwards adjudged to be illegal, and the proceeds of the sale ordered to be refunded. In the mean time, the clerk of the court had absconded, with the moneys in his hands, and it was the purpose of this amendment to pay the amount out of the public Treasury.

Some debate took place on the amendment, in which it was opposed on the ground that the circumstances of the case had not been investigated by a committee of the House; that there were numerous claims of our own citizens which would be unsuccessful at this session, from the want of time to act on them; that this case ought not to have preference, &c. The amendment was supported on the merits and extreme hardship of the case, and the injustice of withholding payment, &c.

The disagreement to this amendment was concurred in by the House, and the bill was again sent to the Senate.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House took up the bill from the Senate, further to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure to complete the payments thereon.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill inserting a clause to exempt from back interest all sums paid previous to the 31st of March, 1820; Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. BARBOUR spoke against the amendment, and Mr. HARRISON in favor of it; the former upon the ground of its being a new principle, which ought not to be adopted without a greater necessity than now appeared to exist; that the bill to which the amendment was offered prevented a forfeiture of such lands as were not paid for one year longer; that this was going far enough—the purchasers had the advantage of the rise of the land, and it was no hardship to make them pay the back interest, which even a court of equity would have made them pay for not complying with their contracts.

To this Mr. HARRISON replied, that the amendment was a reasonable and just provision, both in relation to the public interests as well as that of individuals. The persons who would suffer by the present pecuniary embarrassments were the poorer class of people, who had no agency whatever in producing these embarrassments, and who were not able to bear the heavy penalty which the existing law imposed for suffering the day of payment to pass without making it. Many of them had settled in frontier situations, where the land had not appreciated more than the value of the improvements which had been made upon it. The provision for paying back interest was itself a very hard one, and such as a liberal individual ought not, nor would not, insist upon. The United States had heretofore rigidly exacted it; but the circumstances of the country, in relation to money, were never before as embarrassing. If the amendment was adopted, it would stimulate all the public debtors to make every exertion to raise the money before the expiration of the term to which the bill was limited. That our Treasury would be more embarrassed in the present year than in any subsequent one, from the heavy instalments of the public debt which were to be paid this year. The public, therefore, would be gaining by any measure which would expedite the collection of their debts. It was true that the back interest would amount to a larger sum than the Government would be obliged to give if they were to borrow the money; but, as the back interest was intended to stimulate purchasers to punctuality, it would be in the highest degree unjust to exact it under circumstances like the present, when the want of punctuality was produced by events which those who were subject to pay it could not control.

Mr. HENDRICKS's motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to a third reading; and, after an ineffectual attempt by Mr. MERON to lay it on the table, until the House should have acted on the bill requiring cash payments for public lands, the bill was read the third time, passed, and returned.

TONNAGE DUTIES.

The House took up the bill from the Senate in addition to the act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties, [extending the provisions of that act to the vessels of Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen.]

This bill was explained and supported in a short speech by Mr. PITKIN.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was opposed to the bill in its present shape, and entered into some commercial statements to show that it was inexpedient, particularly as it was in the nature of a convention, and could not be altered for five years. Among his objections, Mr. S. said that a very heavy transit duty was laid by Prussia on our tobacco, passing through the Netherlands, up the Rhine, into her dominions, which had greatly affected the price of that staple in Holland; and he proposed an amendment, substantially, to require of Prussia to lay no higher duty on our tobacco, passing thither through the Netherlands, than was imposed on it if it entered in a Prussian port, as Dantzic, Stetten, Stralsund, &c.

Mr. TRIMBLE made a few remarks, observing, that if this extraordinary duty was laid by Prussia on our tobacco, we ought to impose a corresponding duty on her Silesia linens, &c., and thus beat her with her own weapons.

Mr. SMITH's proposition to amend was negatived by a large majority, and the bill was then read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

MONDAY, March 1.

An engrossed bill for erecting a light-house upon Galloo island, near the outlet of Lake Ontario; for placing sundry spindels and buoys, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys on places designated in Boston, Buzzard, and Chesapeake bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes."

An engrossed bill confirming certain claims to land in the Territory of Illinois was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act confirming certain claims to land in the State of Illinois."

An engrossed bill for the relief of Robert Kidd, of Philadelphia, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act for the relief of Robert Kidd, Seth Webber, and Thomas Page."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the sale of certain military sites; which was read the first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to Congress, at an early period in the next session, a general statement of the condition of the Bank of the United States and its offices, similar to the returns made to him by the bank; and a statement exhibiting, as nearly as may be practicable, the amount of capital invested in the different chartered banks in the several States and in the District of Columbia; the amount of notes issued by those banks and in circulation; the public and private deposits in them; the amount of loans and discounts made by them and remaining unpaid; and the total quantity of specie they possess; and that he be requested also to report such measures as in his opinion may be expedient to procure and retain a sufficient quantity of gold and silver coin in the United States, or to supply a circulating medium in place of specie, adapted to the exigencies of the country, and within the power of the Government.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz: An act extending the term of half pay pensions to the widows and children of certain officers, seamen, and marines, who died in the public service; an act for the relief of John McCausland; and an act for the relief of James Orr, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House, on motion, proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate to continue in force an act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold and silver coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain, and the crowns and five franc pieces of France.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the bill was amended by an entire substitute, without, however, materially changing its provisions; which amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and was subsequently read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements;" and "An act granting a donation of land to the State of Illinois, for the seat of government of said State," in which two bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate granting a donation of land to the State of Illinois for the seat of government, was twice read, passed, and returned.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the report of the select committee on the petition of William Jackson, solicitor on behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, were discharged; and the House then took up and proceeded to consider the said report.

The report concludes with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That each officer of the Revolutionary army who was entitled to half pay for life under the several resolves of Congress upon that subject, and afterwards, in commutation thereof, received the amount of five years' full pay, in certificates or securities of the United States, shall now be paid, by the United States, the nominal amount of such certificates or securities, without interest, deducting therefrom one-eighth part of the said amount."

The report and resolution having been read, and the question having been stated on concurring with the Committee in the resolution—

Mr. McCoy moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which motion was decided in the affirmative, as follows: For postponement, 60; against it 48.

So the motion was rejected, and the subject dismissed for the present session.

CONNECTICUT ASYLUM.

The House next agreed, on motion of Mr. TERRY, by the casting vote of the Speaker, to take up the bill for the benefit of the Connecticut asylum for the deaf and dumb, [granting to it a donation of six sections of the public lands.]

Mr. TERRY briefly adverted to the humane object of this institution, its general and extensive utility, the number of unhappy objects who were already receiving the benefits of the asylum, &c. The bill was also supported by Mr. HARRISON, who agreed in opinion as to its general utility—there being numbers of the unfortunate beings for whose benefit it was intended, scattered through many of the States, if not all, &c.

The bill was opposed by Mr. BASSETT, who deemed the institution entirely a local one, not deserving more than any other local object, the expenditure of national funds on it. He sympathized with the subjects in the institution, but it was not a charitable one, as the rich alone, he understood, received the benefits of the asylum; and he was unwilling to tax the poor for their support; and it was furthermore a precedent which might hereafter be regretted when too late. He moved the commitment of the bill.

Mr. TERRY replied that the institution was strictly charitable, as it was almost exclusively used for the benefit of the indigent.

Mr. POINDEXTER was unwilling to vote a donation of the public lands for this object; a similar donation had been refused to the individual States for the benefit of an university, &c.

Mr. PITKIN replied to the opponents of the bill at some length, and supported the humanity and extensive usefulness and benign effects of the institution.

The motion to commit the bill was lost; and the question being on a third reading, the debate became more extensive—it being supported by Messrs. ORR, TERRY, COLSTON, and MERCER; and opposed by Messrs. BASSETT and BARBOUR; the last named gentleman moving the indefinite postponement of the bill, which was negatived—ayes 43, noes 60, and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

The House then, on motion of Mr. HOLMES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which was referred the bill authorizing the President of the United States to take possession, under the treaty with Spain, of East and West Florida, and providing for the temporary government of the territory.

Mr. HOLMES moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision to authorize the appointment of commissioners for the adjustment of the claims and of the western boundary, in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty, and providing the sum of — dollars to defray the expenses of the said commission.

Mr. H. in proposing this amendment, remarked, that it was made rather in pursuance of the suggestion of one of the Executive Departments, (the Secretary of State,) by whom it was considered necessary, than because it had been deemed essential by the committee. It remained for the House to decide whether it was now proper or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER thought that Congress would act more understandingly on this subject, if it waited for the ratification of the treaty. It was not now known what the duties of those commissioners would be; how extensive, what amount of spoliations they would have to adjust, &c. The bill constituting the commissioners ought to point out the place of their sitting, what kind of evidence they should receive, &c. All these points could be better settled and provided for after the treaty was ratified—until then, the provision would be premature.

Mr. HOPKINSON replied, in substance, that there was little doubt of the ratification of the treaty; and that by authorizing the appointment of commissioners now, much time would be saved; that many of the sufferers from these spoliations looked to this settlement for relief from their distress; that as the treaty would, in all probability, be ratified by July, five or six months of delay would be avoided; that, supposing the Government should allow the sufferers interest on their claims, a prompt settlement would be an important saving to the Government; that the proceedings on the Louisiana convention were similar to what was now proposed; and finally, that as some good might result from the amendment, and no inconvenience whatever, it had better be adopted.

Mr. CLAY expressed great confidence in all the committees of the House, but desired to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, which was, whether the blank in the amendment for the compensation of the commissioners was also proposed in pursuance of the suggestion of the same Executive officer, who it seemed had suggested the amendment itself, and if so, what that sum was intended to be? Mr. C. proceeded to remark, in reply to Mr. HOPKINSON, that he might spare himself any trouble about interest on these claims; if the claimants should get the principal, they would, in his opinion, do very well, as the amount of the claims probably exceeded the five millions to be paid. But the truth was, Mr. C. said, legislation on this subject was premature, and not justified by the necessity of the case. There was no doubt the treaty would be ratified by the King of Spain, unless, on this as on some other subjects, he should be mad; and when the House had authorized the President merely to take possession of the territory, there legislation, at present, ought to stop. As, however, Ferdinand might think proper to withhold his assent from the treaty, this Government would cut rather a ridiculous figure, if it should now proceed in anticipation to execute its stipulations. Another objection Mr. C. observed was, that these commissioners required the confirmation of the Senate, and no time would be gained by this amendment, unless the commissioners were permitted to act before their appointment should be confirmed by the Senate. But, at any rate, very little time would be gained—a month or two at most, before the meeting of the next session of Congress, and he did not think, even if were proper, that it would be worth while now to act on it.

Mr. HOLMES replied that he was prepared to propose a sum for the blank, if the amendment should prevail. As to the suggestions of the Executive officer referred to, Mr. H. said, there were frequent occasions, on subjects like the present, where an Executive officer might be consulted advantageously to the public interests. A sum, it was true, had been suggested to the committee, which was considered requisite to provide for the service proposed by the amendment, but the House could decide if that sum was proper. The objection to this amendment derived from the necessary confirmation of the appointment of the commissioners by the Senate, Mr. H. said, had weight in it; and unless they could be appointed this session, they would be unable to act in the recess. Indeed he thought the bill, as it was, sufficient for the present purposes; but in offering the amendment, it was believed it would expedite the settlement of the claims and be a saving to the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER, among other remarks, said, the President could not make original appointments in the recess of the Senate; all he could do was to fill vacancies—therefore, he could not appoint the commissioners during the recess of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, remarked that every day discovered some improvement in legislation; every day brought forth some novelty in the proceedings of this House. Mr. J. then expressed his strong disapprobation of the practice of having salaries and appropriations pointed out to the House by Executive officers; and contended that the House could fix the salary of an officer, and know what was proper without any advice from that quarter.

The question was then taken on the proposed amendment, and decided in the negative without a division; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and was subsequently read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

The House, on motion of Mr. MIDDLETON, went into Committee of the Whole Mr. PITKIN in the chair, on the bill in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade.

Mr. MIDDLETON took a succinct view of the provisions of this bill, the evils it was intended to remedy, the necessity for its enactment, &c.

Much debate arose on different features of this bill, as they came under consideration. The third and fourth sections, which provide bounties for the officers and crews of the public vessels which shall capture slaves importing into the United States, and to the informers who lead to the conviction of smugglers of slaves into the Union, were warmly opposed by Mr. STROTHER for various reasons of expediency, and not from unwillingness to destroy the traffic and kidnapping, &c., of slaves. Mr. NELSON, opposed these sections because the penalties were not heavy enough for the offence, which he thought ought to be punished with death.

Mr. MERCER supported the bill throughout, explaining and defending its provisions against all objections.

In the course of the discussion, Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, proposed the following as an additional section, which he prefaced by a few remarks to show that the clause he offered was called for by a due regard for the interests of the State which he represented. The amendment was in the following words, and was agreed to without opposition, viz:

"That it shall be the duty of the commander of any armed vessel of the United States, whenever he shall make any capture under the provisions of this act, to bring the vessel and her cargo for adjudication into some of the ports of the State or Territory to which such vessel so captured shall belong, if he can ascertain the same, if not, then to be sent into any convenient port of the United States."

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1819.

Mr. PINDALL, after some prefatory remarks, offered the following, as an additional section which was agreed to, viz:

"That every person who shall import into the United States, or knowingly aid or abet the importation into the United States, of any African negro, or other person, with intent to sell or use such negro, or other person, so to be imported, as a slave, or shall purchase any such slave, knowing him or her to be thus imported, shall, on conviction thereof, in any circuit court of the United States, be punished by death."

After unsuccessful attempts of Mr. STROTHER, to strike out the third and fourth sections, the Committee rose and reported the amendments to the House which were concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The engrossed bill for the benefit of the Connecticut Asylum, for the instruction of the deaf and dumb, was read the third time.

Mr. STROTHER spoke some time in opposition to the bill, and was replied to by Messrs. TERRY, PITKIN, and LIVERMORE; when the bill was passed, yeas 57, noes 45, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

TUESDAY, March 2.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making appropriations to carry into effect treaties concluded with several Indian tribes therein mentioned," reported the same, without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred bills from the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslande," and "An act for the relief of Francis B. Languille," reported the said bills, with an amendment to the latter, and the bills were committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which is referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan G. Birdseye and Daniel Booth," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate, requesting the President of the United States to employ an artist to ascertain the latitude of 36 degrees 30 minutes north, reported the same without amendment; and, on motion, the resolution was laid on the table.

The House took up the bill from the Senate, to regulate and fix the salaries of the registers and receivers of public moneys.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to amend the bill by striking out $4,500, the amount of salary fixed by the Senate, and to insert $3,000; which motion, after some discussion, was agreed to; and then,

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the bill was indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Military Committee were discharged from the further consideration of all such petitions referred to them at the present session, upon which they have not yet reported; and the said petitions were laid on the table.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a report of the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, made to the House during the present session, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained, after some explanatory remarks by Mr. P., was concurred in, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund be instructed to use all the means which the laws place within their power, to coerce payment of the balances due to the fund from all persons who may be found indebted to the same, and that they report to the House of Representatives at an early period of the next session of Congress, a particular statement of the means which have been used, and the success of those means in accomplishing the objects of this resolution: And also, that they report whether any, and what, additional legislative provisions may be necessary to compel a compliance with the different provisions of the laws on this subject."

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate to incorporate into one act the several acts concerning hospitals, and sick and disabled seamen; and then, on motion of Mr. P., made by the instruction of the Naval Committee, the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the consideration of all such petitions, and other matters referred to them at the present session, upon which they have not reported.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes, adjoining the frontier settlements," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making appropriations to carry into effect treaties concluded with the several Indian tribes therein mentioned."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act regulating the payments to invalid pensioners," with amendments; and they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the superintendent thereof; an act for the relief of Vincent Grant; an act for the relief of Joseph Lefebvre; an act for the relief of Labedoyere de Kermion; and an act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices; in which amendments, and five last mentioned bills, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathan G. Birdseye and Daniel Booth," was read the third time, and passed.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:

MARCH, 1819.

H. or R.

An act authorizing the sale of certain military sites; and an act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade; were severally read the third time, and passed.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Joseph Lefebvre; an act for the relief of Labedoyere de Kermion; an act for the relief of Vincent Grant; and an act relative to the Patent Office, and to the salary of the superintendent thereof; were severally read twice, and referred; the first and second to the same Committee of the Whole, to-day; the third to the Committee of Claims, and the fourth to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bills of this House, of the following titles, to wit: An act regulating the payments to invalid pensioners; and an act for the relief of Hannah Ring and Luther Frink; were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

Mr. FOLGER, from a select committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate for the relief of Daniel Pettibone, (renewing his patent for welding steel to iron,) reported that it was inexpedient to pass the bill; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to revive the powers of the Commissioners for ascertaining and deciding on claims to land in the district of Detroit, and for settling the claims to lands at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Michigan," in which bill they ask the concurrence of the House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices, was read the third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

MISSOURI STATE.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill authorizing the formation of a State government for the Territory of Missouri, and concurred in all of them, except that which struck out the prohibitory clause concerning the admission and toleration of slavery.

Some debate arising again on the principle of this amendment, Mr. TALLMADGE moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

This motion was discussed at some length; Messrs. MILLS, TAYLOR, and TALLMADGE, supporting the postponement, and Messrs. SCOTT, ANDERSON, of Kentucky, POINDEXTER, TUCKER, of Virginia, BARBOUR, of Virginia, and BEECHER, opposing it; and was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Folger, Fuller, Gage, Gilbert, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Hopkinson, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Irving of New York, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Mills, Samuel Moore, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogle, Palmer, Patterson, Pawling, Pitkin, Rice, Rich, Richards, Rogers, Ruggles, Sampson, Schuyler, Sergeant, Sherwood, Silsbee, Southard, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terry, Tompkins, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Wilkin, Williams of Connecticut, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour of Va., Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Blount, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cobb, Colston, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Davidson, Desha, Earle, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hogg, Holmes, Huntington, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, McLean of Illinois, McCoy, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Mercer, Middleton, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, New, Newton, Ogden, Owen, Parrott, Pegram, Peter, Pindall, Pleasants, Poindexter, Reed of Georgia, Rhea, Ringgold, Robertson, Settle, Seybert, S. Smith, Ballard Smith, Alexander Smyth, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Strother, Stuart of Maryland, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams of North Carolina.

All the said amendments were then concurred in, except that which proposes to strike out the following clause: "The further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude, be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. And that all children of slaves born within the said State, after the admission thereof into the Union, shall be free, but may be held to service until the age of twenty-five years;" and insert, "the Legislature of the said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the titles in such soil, to the bona fide purchasers; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands, the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

The question was then taken to concur with the Senate in striking out the said clause, and determined in the negative—yeas 76, nays 78, as follows:

lina, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams of North Carolina.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Beecher, Bennett, Boden, Boss, Campbell, Comstock, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Ellicott, Folger, Fuller, Gage, Gilbert, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Hopkinson, Hostetter, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Kinsey, Kirland, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Mason of R. Island, Merrill, Mills, Robert Moore, Samuel Moore, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogles, Orr, Palmer, Patterson, Pawling, Pitkin, Rice, Rich, Richards, Rogers, Ruggles, Sampson, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Sherwood, Silsbee, Southard, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terry, Tompkins, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Wilkin, Williams of Connecticut, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

So the House refused to agree with the Senate in striking out the clause, and the bill was returned to the Senate.

SENATE BILLS, &c.

The bill from the Senate making appropriations to carry into effect treaties concluded with the several Indian tribes therein mentioned, was read the third time and passed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements.

This bill was opposed by Mr. BARBOUR, on various grounds of expediency, without being at all opposed to the object which the bill had in view, but which it was not calculated to effect, and moved to strike out the first section of the bill. The motion was opposed by Messrs. MILLS, MERCER, TALLMADGE, and HARRISON, and was finally negatived—ayes 25, noes 78; and the bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time accordingly, passed, and returned.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate for the adjustment of claims to land and establishing land offices in the district east of the island of Orleans.

Mr. LOWNDE, for reasons which he offered at large to the House, moved to postpone the bill indefinitely. The motion was earnestly opposed by Messrs. POINDEXTER and BUTLER of Louisiana, and was finally agreed to; but,

On motion of Mr. TERRY, this vote was subsequently reconsidered, and the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was read a third time, passed and returned.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade," with an amendment. They have also passed a "resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers," in which amendment and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The joint resolution from the Senate, directing the manner of executing, and fixing the prices to be paid for the public printing, was thrice read, passed, and returned to the Senate.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade," was read and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate to provide for the due execution of the laws of the Union in the State of Illinois, passed through a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HUGH NELSON in the chair,) and was subsequently read the third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

MISSOURI STATE.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing that they adhere to their amendment, (striking out the restriction of slavery,) to the bill authorizing a State government for the Missouri Territory.

The said message was then taken up; when Mr. TAYLOR moved that this House adhere to its disagreement to said amendment; which motion brought on a renewal of the debate on the subject; in which the restriction was zealously supported by Messrs. TAYLOR, MILLS, and TALLMADGE, and as zealously opposed by Mr. COBB.

Mr. COBB observed that he did not rise for the purpose of detaining the attention of the House for any length of time. He was too sensible of the importance of each moment which yet remained of the session, to obtrude many remarks upon their patience. But, upon a measure involving the important consequences that this did, he felt it to be an imperious duty to express his sentiments, and to enter his most solemn protest against the principle proposed for adoption by the amendment. Were gentlemen aware of what they were about to do? Did they foresee no evil consequences likely to result out of the measure if adopted? Could they suppose that the Southern States would submit with patience to a measure, the effect of which would be to exclude them from all enjoyment of the vast region purchased by the United States beyond the Mississippi, and which belonged equally to them as to the Northern States? He ventured to assure them that they would not. The people of the slaveholding States, as they are called, know their rights, and will insist upon the enjoyment of them. He should not now attempt to go over ground already occupied by others, with much more ability, and attempt to show that, by the treaty with France, the people of that territory were secured in the enjoyment of the property which they held in their slaves. That the proposed amendment was an infraction of this treaty, had been most clearly shown. Nor would he attempt to rescue from slander the character of the people of the Southern States in their conduct towards, and treatment of, their black population. That had also been done, with a degree of force and eloquence to which he could pretend no claim, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and the honorable Speaker. He was, however, clearly of opinion that Congress possessed no power under the Constitution to adopt the principle proposed in the amendment. He called upon the advocates of it to point out, and lay their finger upon, that clause of the Constitution of the United States which gives to this body the right to legislate upon the subject. Could they show in what clause or section this right was expressly given, or from which it could be inferred? Unless this authority could be shown, Congress would be assuming a power, if the amendment prevailed, not delegated to them, and most dangerous in its exercise. What is the end and tendency of the measure proposed? It is to impose upon the State of Missouri conditions not imposed upon any other State. It is to deprive her of one branch of sovereignty not surrendered by any other State in the Union, not even those beyond the Ohio; for all of them had legislated upon this subject: all of them had decided for themselves whether slavery should be tolerated at the time they framed their several constitutions. He would not now discuss the propriety of admitting slavery. It is not now a question whether it is politic or impolitic to tolerate slavery in the United States, or in a particular State. It was a discussion into which he would not permit himself to be dragged. Admit, however, its moral impropriety: yet there was a vast difference between moral impropriety and political sovereignty. The people of New York or Pennsylvania may deem it highly immoral and politically improper to permit slavery, but yet, they possess the sovereign right and power to permit it, if they choose. They can to-morrow so alter their constitutions and laws as to admit it, if they were so disposed. It is a branch of sovereignty which the old thirteen States never surrendered in the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Now the bill proposes that the new State shall be admitted upon an equal footing with the other States of the Union. It is in this way only that she can be admitted, under the Constitution. These words can have no other meaning than that she shall be required to surrender no more of her rights of sovereignty, than the other States, into a union with which she is about to be admitted, have surrendered. But if the proposed amendment is adopted, will not this new State be shorn of one branch of her sovereignty, one right, which the other States may and have exercised, (whether properly or not, is immaterial,) and do now exercise whenever they think fit?

Mr. C. observed that he did conceive the principle involved in the amendment pregnant with danger. It was one, he repeated, to which he believed the people of the region of country which he represented would not quietly submit. He might perhaps subject himself to ridicule for attempting the display of a spirit of prophecy which he did not possess, or of zeal and enthusiasm for which he was entitled to little credit. But he warned the advocates of this measure against the certain effects which it must produce. Effects destructive of the peace and harmony of the Union. He believed that they were kindling a fire which all the waters of the ocean could not extinguish. It could be extinguished only in blood!

The question was finally taken on adhering to the former decision of the House, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays. For adhering 78, against it 66, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bayley, Bloomfield, Blount, Burwell, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Colston, Crawford, Davidson, Desha, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Harrison, Herbert, Hogg, Holmes, Johnson of Virginia, Jones, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Illinois, McCoy, Marr, Mason of Massachusetts, Mercer, Middleton, H. Smith, Ballard Smith, Alexander Smyth, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Storrs, Strother, Terrell, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of Kentucky, and Williams of North Carolina.

The adherence of the two Houses to their respective opinions, precluding any further propositions or compromise on the subject, the bill was of course lost.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, (Mr. COBB in the chair,) on the bill concerning invalid pensioners, and made some progress therein; when, about sunset, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

The Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee of Claims, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, were discharged from the further consideration of such matters and things as may have been referred to them at the present session, and upon which they have not reported.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the Commissioners of the Marine and Navy Hospital Funds, were instructed to report to this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, whether any alterations are necessary in the laws constituting and regulating these funds; and if they shall be of opinion that any changes are necessary, that they report the same, with a plan for establishing such a system as will, in their opinions, best promote the object of the institutions.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rice Jones." The bill was reported without amendment, read a third time, and passed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Hogan." The bill was reported with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House; and the bill read a third time, and passed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, of the present session, concerning invalid pensioners. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was read and disagreed to by the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" as also, on the bill further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other other purposes, and on the several subjects thereto committed; and after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the first mentioned bill without amendment, and asked leave to sit again on the residue of the order; which was granted by the House.

The first mentioned bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, to-day, which was done, and the bill passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House, of the following titles, to wit: "An act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys, on places designated in Boston, Buzzard's and Chesapeake Bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes;" "An act to alter and establish certain post roads;" "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein;" with amendments to each. The Senate have also passed a bill entitled "An act to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands."

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMES moved that it lie on the table; both of which motions being rejected,

Mr. BALL moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; when,

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and to establish a temporary government therein," were taken up and read; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House concur in all the said amendments, except that which proposes to add a new section as the fifth section of the said bill, with an amendment to the fifth and sixth of the said amendments.

Resolved, That this House do not agree to so much of the said amendments, as proposes to add a new section to the said bill.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys, on places designated in Boston, Buzzard's and Chesapeake bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes; and, An act to alter and establish certain post roads, were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress," was read twice; and, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COLSTON moved the House again to resume the consideration of the bill from the Senate, making further provision for the sale of the public lands; which was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill of this House, entitled An act for the relief of Henry Batman, with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of the House.

The amendment was read, and concurred in. The House adjourned until 6 o'clock, P. M.

Six o'clock, P. M.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Rees Hill;" which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the purchase of fire engines, and for building houses for the safekeeping of the same." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OGDEN, the several persons who have presented petitions to this House during the present session, and upon which the House have not acted, had leave to withdraw the same, and also the several papers which have been exhibited by them in support thereof.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Aquilla Giles." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to establish a new land office in the State of Illinois;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the House to come to the following order:

Ordered, That no printing directed by this House to be executed shall be received from the printer, by the officers thereof, after the first day of May next.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish a new land office in the State of Illinois," was read the first time; and, on the question, Shall the said bill be read the second time? there appeared—yeas 70, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Austin, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Barber of Ohio, Bayley, Butler of Louisiana, Cobb, Comstock, Davidson, Drake, Elliott, Fisher, Floyd, Folger, Garnett, Gilbert, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hendricks, Herrick, Holmes, Hubbard, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Jones, Lewis, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, McLean of Illinois, Mason of Massachusetts, Mercer, Middleton, Samuel Moore, Moseley, Jeremiah Nelson, H. Nelson, Newton, Ogle, Owen, Palmer, Parrott, Pegram, Peter, Pitkin, Reed of Maryland, Reed of Georgia, Rhea, Rich, Ringgold, Rogers, Ruggles, Sampson, Settle, Seybert, Silabee, Speed, Storrs, Stuart of Maryland, Tarr, Tyler, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Westerlo, Williams of North Carolina, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bateman, Bennett, Darlington, Earle, Hopkinson, Little, McLane of Delaware, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Murray, Ogden, Schuyler, Sergeant, S. Smith, Southard, Tallmadge, Terrell, Terry, Whitman, and Williams of Connecticut.

Thus it appeared that a quorum was not present.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the election of a printer, to execute the printing ordered by the House of Representatives during the next Congress, in pursuance of the "Resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and for the appointment of a printer or printers to Congress." And, upon an examination of the ballots, it appeared that JOSEPH GALES, Jr., and WILLIAM W. SEATON, under the firm of GALES and SEATON, were duly elected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have elected Gales and Seaton printers, on their part, to execute the printing of the Senate during the next Congress, pursuant to the resolution on that subject. They have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are about to adjourn, if he has no further communications to make to them, and have appointed a committee on their part.

The said resolution was read and concurred in by the House, and Messrs. PITKIN and HARRISON were appointed of the said committee on their part.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—46

directing him to inform this House what sums of money have been paid to the Attorney General of the United States for extra services, designating the service, and the fund from which the money has been paid; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1819.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th ultimo, which has been this day received, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the House what sums of money have been paid to the Attorney General of the United States for extra services, designating the services and the fund from which the money has been paid, I have the honor to state that, on the 18th of December, 1818, there was paid to the Attorney General the sum of $950, and, on the 21st of the same month, the further sum of $550. These two sums were paid on the requisition of the Secretary of State for services rendered by the Attorney General in the trials which took place in Baltimore for violations of the provisions of the "act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," passed on the 20th day of April, 1818.

The former of these sums was paid out of the appropriation of $6,000 "for the discharge of such claims against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury;" and the latter out of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The whole sum would have been paid out of the former appropriation if the amount unapplied to other objects had been sufficient to discharge it.

Copies of the requisitions from the State Department, upon which the money was paid, are enclosed.

No other payments have been made to the Attorney General from the Treasury for services rendered to the United States, except the sum of $100, in the year 1814, for services rendered in the case of the United States against Brown and others, upon certain protested bills of exchange. This sum was paid out of the fund first above mentioned. The services for which compensation has been made to the Attorney General from the Treasury were not rendered in the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. H. CLAY, Speaker House of Reps.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

On motion of Mr. HUGH NELSON, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable Henry Clay, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Upon which Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the House as follows:

I beg you to receive, gentlemen, my most respectful acknowledgments for the flattering vote you have done me the honor to pass. Always entertaining for this House the highest consideration, the expression of your approbation conveys a gratification as pure as it is indescribable. I owe it to truth, however, to say, gentlemen, that, but for the almost unlimited confidence with which you have constantly sustained the

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Hogan." The bill was reported with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House; and the bill read a third time, and passed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, of the present session, concerning invalid pensioners. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was read and disagreed to by the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, in addition to, and alteration of, an act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" as also, on the bill further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other other purposes, and on the several subjects thereto committed; and after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the first mentioned bill without amendment, and asked leave to sit again on the residue of the order; which was granted by the House.

The first mentioned bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, to-day, which was done, and the bill passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House, of the following titles, to wit: "An act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys, on places designated in Boston, Buzzard's and Chesapeake Bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes;" "An act to alter and establish certain post roads;" "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein;" with amendments to each. The Senate have also passed a bill entitled "An act to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands."

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMES moved that it lie on the table; both of which motions being rejected,

Mr. BALL moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; when,

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of

Resolved, That this House concur in all the said amendments, except that which proposes to add a new section as the fifth section of the said bill, with an amendment to the fifth and sixth of the said amendments.

Resolved, That this House do not agree to so much of the said amendments, as proposes to add a new section to the said bill.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys, on places designated in Boston, Buzzard's and Chesapeake bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes; and, An act to alter and establish certain post roads, were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress," was read twice; and, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COLSTON moved the House again to resume the consideration of the bill from the Senate, making further provision for the sale of the public lands; which was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Batman, with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of the House.

Thus it appeared that a quorum was not present.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the election of a printer, to execute the printing ordered by the House of Representatives during the next Congress, in pursuance of the "Resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and for the appointment of a printer or printers to Congress." And, upon an examination of the ballots, it appeared that JOSEPH GALES, Jr., and WILLIAM W. SEATON, under the firm of GALES and SEATON, were duly elected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have elected Gales and Seaton printers, on their part, to execute the printing of the Senate during the next Congress, pursuant to the resolution on that subject. They have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are about to adjourn, if he has no further communications to make to them, and have appointed a committee on their part.

The said resolution was read and concurred in by the House, and Messrs. PITKIN and HARRISON were appointed of the said committee on their part.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—46

directing him to inform this House what sums of money have been paid to the Attorney General of the United States for extra services, designating the service, and the fund from which the money has been paid; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1819.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th ultimo, which has been this day received, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the House what sums of money have been paid to the Attorney General of the United States for extra services, designating the services and the fund from which the money has been paid, I have the honor to state that, on the 18th of December, 1818, there was paid to the Attorney General the sum of $950, and, on the 21st of the same month, the further sum of $550. These two sums were paid on the requisition of the Secretary of State for services rendered by the Attorney General in the trials which took place in Baltimore for violations of the provisions of the "act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," passed on the 20th day of April, 1818.

The former of these sums was paid out of the appropriation of $6,000 "for the discharge of such claims against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury;" and the latter out of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The whole sum would have been paid out of the former appropriation if the amount unapplied to other objects had been sufficient to discharge it.

Copies of the requisitions from the State Department, upon which the money was paid, are enclosed.

No other payments have been made to the Attorney General from the Treasury for services rendered to the United States, except the sum of $100, in the year 1814, for services rendered in the case of the United States against Brown and others, upon certain protested bills of exchange. This sum was paid out of the fund first above mentioned. The services for which compensation has been made to the Attorney General from the Treasury were not rendered in the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. H. CLAY, Speaker House of Reps.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

On motion of Mr. HUGH NELSON, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable Henry Clay, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Upon which Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the House as follows:

I beg you to receive, gentlemen, my most respectful acknowledgments for the flattering vote you have done me the honor to pass. Always entertaining for this House the highest consideration, the expression of your approbation conveys a gratification as pure as it is indescribable. I owe it to truth, however, to say, gentlemen, that, but for the almost unlimited confidence with which you have constantly sustained the Chair, I should have been utterly incompetent to discharge its arduous duties.

If, gentlemen, in the course of our deliberations, momentary irritation has been at any time felt, or unkind expressions have ever, in the heat of debate, fallen from any of us, let these unpleasant incidents be consigned to oblivion, and let us recollect only the anxious desire which has uniformly animated every one to promote what appeared to him to be for the prosperity of our common country.

One painful circumstance fills me with the deepest regret. It is that, after having co-operated with many of you, with some for years, to advance the public good, we separate to meet perhaps no more. I here bear testimony to the fidelity with which you have all labored to fulfil the high and honorable trust committed to us by the nation. And every one of you will carry with you my most ardent wishes for your individual welfare and happiness.

Mr. PITKIN, from the joint committee appointed to inform the President of the United States that the two Houses of Congress are about to adjourn, if he had no further communications to make to them, reported that the committee had waited on the President of the United States, and was informed by him that he had no further communications to make.

A message was then received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate, having completed the legislative business before them, are ready to adjourn; whereupon, the House adjourned sine die.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.

[SECOND SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

GREAT BRITAIN—CONVENTION OF OCTOBER 20, 1818.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 29, 1818.]

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration, a convention signed at London on the 20th of October last, between the United States and Great Britain, together with the documents showing the course and progress of the negotiation. I have to request that these documents, which are original, may be returned when the Senate shall have acted on the convention.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 29, 1818.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Baker, Chargé des Affaires from England.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 18, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you a copy of a letter from the collector of the customs at Barnstable to the Secretary of the Treasury, by which it appears that an American vessel engaged in the cod fishery, in longitude 65° 20', latitude 42° 41', was warned off by the commander of the British sloop-of-war Jaseur, and ordered not to approach within sixty miles of the coast; with which order the commander of the American vessel immediately complied. It appears, also, that a similar warning had been given by the commander of the Jaseur to all the other American vessels that were then in sight.

This extraordinary measure has excited no small degree of surprise. Being altogether incompatible with the rights of the United States, it is presumed that it has not been authorized by your Government. I invite your attention to it, in the hope that as you have been charged by your Government with the execution of the late treaty of peace, and are acquainted with its views on all questions connected with it, you will consider yourself authorized to interpose to prevent the progress of an evil which will be so extensively and deeply felt by the citizens of the United States. I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

A. ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq., &amp;c.

Collector of the Customs at Barnstable to the Secretary of the Treasury.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, BARNSTABLE,

July 3, 1815.

SIR: I think it my duty to inform you that the captain of a vessel regularly licensed for the cod fishery has just reported to this office that, on the 19th day of June last, being in longitude 65° 20', north latitude 42° 41', about forty-five miles distant from Cape Sable, he fell in with His Britannic Majesty's sloop-of-war Jaseur, N. Lock, commander, who warned him off, and endorsed his enrolment and license in the words following:

"JUNE 19, 1815.

"Warned off the coast by His Majesty's sloop Jaseur, not to come within sixty miles.

"N. LOCK, Captain."

In consequence of which, the fisherman immediately left the fishing ground, and returned home without completing his fare.

The captain of the fisherman further states, that all the fishing vessels then in sight were warned off in the same manner by the said Captain Lock. I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

ISAIAH L. GREEN,

Collector.

Hon. A. J. DALLAS.

Mr. Baker to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, August 31, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo, together with its enclosure, relating to the warning off, to the distance of sixty miles from the coast of Nova Scotia, of some American fishing vessels by His Majesty's brig Jaseur.

This measure was, as you have justly presumed in your note, totally unauthorized by His Maasty's Government; and I have the satisfaction to acquaint you that orders have been given by the naval commanders-in-chief on the Halifax and Newfoundland stations, which will effectually prevent the recurrence of any similar interruption to the vessels belonging to the United States engaged in fishing on the high seas.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY ST. J. BAKER.

Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adams, dated

JULY 21, 1815.

Among the acts which we have to complain of with greatest earnestness is a late warning given by a commander of a British sloop-of-war to our fishermen near the coast of the British northern colonies to retire thence to the distance of twenty leagues. This, it is presumed, has been done under a construction of the late Treaty of Peace, which, by being silent on the subject, left that important interest to rest on the ground on which it was placed by the Treaty of 1783. The right of the fisheries required no new stipulation to support it: it was sufficiently secured by the Treaty of 1783. This important object will claim our early attention. The measure thus promptly taken by the British Government, without any communication with this Government, notwithstanding the declaration of our Ministers at Ghent that our right would not be affected by the silence of the treaty, indicates a spirit which excites equal surprise and regret—one which by no means corresponds with the amicable relations established between the two countries by that treaty, or with the spirit with which it has been executed by the United States.

As you are well acquainted with the solidity of our right to the fisheries in question, as well as to those on the Grand Bank and elsewhere on the main ocean, to the limit of a marine league only from the coast, (for the pretension to remove us twenty leagues is too absurd to be discussed,) I shall not dilate on it, especially at this time. It is sufficient to observe here, that the right of the United States to take fish on the coast of Newfoundland, and on the coasts, bays, and creeks, of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of Nova Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador—in short, that every right appertaining to the fisheries, which was secured by the Treaty of 1783, stands now as unshaken and perfect as it then did, constituting a vital part of our political existence, and resting on the same solid foundation as our independence itself. In the act of dismemberment and partition, the rights of each party were distinctly defined. So much of territory and incidental rights were allotted to one, so much to the other; and as well might it be said, because our boundary had not been retraced by the late treaty, in every part, that certain portions of our territory had reverted to England, as that our right to fish, by whatever name secured, had experienced that fate. A liberty of unlimited duration, thus secured, is as much a right as if it had been stipulated by any other term. Being to be enjoyed by one, adjoining the territory allotted by the partition to the other party, it seemed to be the appropriate term. I have made these remarks to show the solid ground on which this right is deemed to rest by this Government, relying on your thorough knowledge of the subject to illustrate and support it in the most suitable manner.

It can scarcely be presumed that the British Government, after the result of the late experiment, in the present state of Europe, and under its other engagements, can seriously contemplate a renewal of hostilities. But it often happens with nations, as well as with individuals, that a just estimate of their interest and duties is not an infallible criterion of their conduct. We ought to be prepared at every point to guard against such an event. You will be attentive to circumstances, and give us timely notice of any danger which may be menaced.

LONDON, August 15, 1815.

I had mentioned the subject of the slaves in my first interview with him, [Lord Castlereagh,] and he had then expressed an intention to refer it to the Commissioners with whom we were then negotiating the commercial convention. But they received no instructions relative to it, and considered their powers as limited to the objects upon which my colleagues were authorized, conjointly with me, to treat. The day before Lord Castlereagh left town, I spoke to him again concerning it. He had just received despatches from Mr. Baker relating to it, but had not had time to read them, and merely told me that, during his absence, Lord Liverpool or Lord Bathurst would attend to the business of his department. After writing the note, of which the copy is enclosed, I requested an interview with Lord Liverpool, for which he appointed last Saturday; but an accident prevented me from then meeting him. I have renewed the request; but as he was not in town when my note was sent, it may be deferred until after Mr. Bagot's departure.

[NOTE.—The letter referred to in the above despatch is inserted among the papers relating to the deportation of slaves—Appendix, 2d session, 14th Congress.]

LONDON, September 5, 1815.

In compliance with your instructions of July 21, I have this day addressed Lord Castlereagh, claiming payment from the British Government for the slaves carried away from Cumberland island and the adjoining waters, after the ratification of the treaty of peace, and in contravention to one of the express stipulations of that treaty.

Relations with Great Britain.

My preceding despatches, Nos. 9 and 10, will have informed you of the steps I had taken, by an official letter to Lord Castlereagh, and by a personal interview with the Earl of Liverpool, in relation to this subject, previous to the receipt of your last instructions. The letter to Lord Castlereagh has hitherto remained unanswered; and Lord Liverpool made no attempt to answer either the reasoning of your letter on the subject to Mr. Baker, or the statement of the proof with regard to the meaning of the article, resulting from the manner in which it had been drawn up and agreed to. The substance of what he said was, that, in agreeing to the article as it stands, they had not been aware that it would bind them to restore the slaves whom their officers had enticed away by promises of freedom.

The case of these slaves carried away from Cumberland seems not even to admit of the distinction to which Mr. Baker and Lord Liverpool resorted. Yet the prospect of obtaining either restoration or indemnity appears to me not more favorable in this case than in any others of the same class. If there were any probability that this Government would admit the principle of making indemnity, it would become necessary for me to remark, that the list of slaves transmitted to me, and of which I have sent to Lord Castlereagh a copy, is not an authenticated document.

LONDON, September 19, 1815.

The transactions to which your instructions of the 21st July have reference were of a character to excite in the highest degree the attention of the Government of the United States. So many simultaneous acts of British officers, at various stations and upon both elements, indicating a marked spirit of hostility, were calculated to inspire serious doubts with regard to the pacific—not to say the amicable—dispositions of the British Government; and the latter part of your despatch made it incumbent upon me, under certain contingencies, to take measures, of which nothing that had occurred here had induced me even to think, as precautions which the course of events might render expedient. The commercial convention had shown how excessively difficult it was for British and American Plenipotentiaries to agree upon any one point in which the mutual interests of the two countries were involved. It had shown how very few points there were upon which any agreement could be made; and it was evident, from everything excepting the personal courtesies of the Prince and his cabinet, that the animosities of the condition from which the two nations had lately emerged had very little subsided. I had, however, before the receipt of your despatch, not a suspicion that an immediate renewal of hostilities was contemplated; and even now, although I perceive no reason for flattering myself that any satisfaction will be given us upon any one of our causes of complaint, yet I do not apprehend that any act of open and avowed hostility will be sanctioned by the British Government at the present moment. It must however be added that the most—perhaps the only—unequivocal pledge of pacific intentions is the reduction of the fleet, not only to a peace establishment, but to an unusually small one. Your despatch, and the several procedures to which it related, awakened an anxiety that nothing should be omitted which could be of any possible utility to our interests in this quarter.

Having formally renewed the claim of the restitution of the slaves carried away contrary to the engagements of the Treaty of Peace, or for payment of their value as the alternative, there were other objects which I deemed it necessary to present again to the consideration of this Government. In the first instance, it seemed advisable to open them by a verbal communication; and I requested of Lord Bathurst an interview, for which he appointed the 14th instant, when I called at his office in Downing street. I said that, having lately received despatches from you respecting several objects of some importance to the relations between the two countries, my first object in asking to see him had been to inquire whether he had received from Mr. Baker a communication of the correspondence between you and him relative to the surrender of Michilimackinac; to the proceedings of Colonel Nicholls in the southern part of the United States; and to the warning given by the captain of the British armed vessel Jaseur to certain American fishing vessels to withdraw from the fishing grounds to the distance of sixty miles from the coast. He answered, that he had received all these papers from Mr. Baker about four days ago; that an answer with regard to the warning of the fishing vessels had immediately been sent; but on the other subjects there had not been time to examine the papers and prepare the answers. I asked him if he could, without inconvenience, state the substance of the answer that had been sent. He said, certainly; it had been that as, on the one hand, Great Britain could not permit the vessels of the United States to fish within the creeks and close upon the shores of the British territories, so, on the other hand, it was by no means her intention to interrupt them fishing anywhere in the open sea, or without the territorial jurisdiction—a marine league from the shore; and, therefore, that the warning given at the place stated, in the case referred to, was altogether unauthorized. I replied, that the particular act of the British commander in this instance being disavowed, I trusted that the British Government, before adopting any final determination upon the subject, would estimate in candor, and in that spirit of amity which my own Government was anxiously desirous of maintaining in our relations with this country, the considerations which I was instructed to pre-

But in support of the right of the people of the United States to fish on the whole coast of North America, which they have uniformly enjoyed from the first settlement of the country; that was my intention to address, in the course of a few days, a letter to him on the subject. He said that they would give due attention to the letter, but I should send him, but that Great Britain had explicitly manifested her intention concerning it; that this subject, as I doubtless knew, had excited a great deal of feeling in this country, perhaps much more than its importance deserved; that their own fishermen considered it as an excessive hardship to be supplanted by American fishermen, even upon the very shores of the British dominions. I said that those whose sensibilities had been thus excited had probably not considered the question of right in the point of view in which it had been regarded by us; that they were the sensibilities of a partial and individual interest, stimulated by the passions of competition, and considering the right of the Americans as if it had been a privilege granted to them by the British Government. If this interest was to have weight in determining the policy of the Cabinet, there was another interest liable to be affected in the opposite manner, which would be entitled equally to consideration—the manufacturing interest. The question of right had not been discussed at the negotiation of Ghent. The British Plenipotentiaries had given a notice that the British Government did not intend hereafter to grant to the people of the United States the right to fish, and to cure and dry fish within the exclusive British jurisdiction in America, without an equivalent, as it had been granted by the Treaty of Peace, in 1783. The American Plenipotentiaries had given notice, in return, that the American Government considered all the rights and liberties in and to the fisheries on the whole coast of North America, as sufficiently secured by the possession of them, which had always been enjoyed previous to the Revolution, and by the recognition of them in the Treaty of Peace, in 1783; that they did not think any new stipulation necessary for a further confirmation of the right, no part of which did they consider as having been forfeited by the war. It was obvious that the Treaty of Peace of 1783 was not one of those ordinary treaties which, by the usages of nations, were held to be annulled by a subsequent war between the same parties: it was not simply a treaty of peace; it was a treaty of partition between two parts of one nation, agreeing thenceforth to be separated into two distinct Sovereignities. The conditions upon which this was done constituted, essentially, the independence of the United States, and the preservation of all the fishing rights, which they had constantly enjoyed over the whole coast of North America, was among the most important of them. This was no concession, no grant on the part of Great Britain, which could be annulled by a war. There had been, in the same Treaty of 1783, a right recognised in British subjects to navigate the Mississippi.

This right the British Plenipotentiaries at Ghent had considered as still a just claim on the part of Great Britain, notwithstanding the war that had intervened. The American Plenipotentiaries, to remove all future discussion upon both points, had offered to agree to an article expressly confirming both the rights. In declining this, an offer had been made on the part of Great Britain of an article stipulating to negotiate in future for the renewal of both the rights, for equivalents, which was declined by the American Plenipotentiaries, on the express ground that its effect would have been an implied admission that the rights had been annulled. There was, therefore, no article concerning them in the treaty, and the question as to the right was not discussed. I now stated the ground upon which the Government of the United States considered the right as subsisting and unimpaired. The Treaty of 1783 was, in its essential nature, not liable to be annulled by a subsequent war. It acknowledged the United States as a sovereign and independent Power. It would be an absurdity, inconsistent with the acknowledgment itself, to suppose it liable to be forfeited by a war. The whole Treaty of Ghent did constantly refer to it as existing and in full force, nor was an intimation given that any further confirmation of it was supposed to be necessary. It would be for the British Government ultimately to determine how far this reasoning was to be admitted as correct. There were, also, considerations of policy and expediency, to which I hoped they would give suitable attention, before they should come to a final decision upon this point. I thought it my duty to suggest them, that they might not be overlooked. The subject was viewed by my countrymen as highly important, and I was anxious to omit no effort which might possibly have an influence in promoting friendly sentiments between the two nations, or in guarding against the excitement of others. These fisheries afforded the means of subsistence to multitudes of people who were destitute of any other; they also afforded the means of remittance to Great Britain in payment for articles of her manufactures exported to America. It was well understood to be the policy of Great Britain that no unnecessary stimulus should be given to the manufactures in the United States, which would diminish the importance of those from Great Britain. But, by depriving the fishermen of the United States of this source of subsistence, the result must be to throw them back upon the country, and drive them to the resort of manufacturing for themselves; while, on the other hand, it would cut off the means of making remittances in payment for the manufactures of Great Britain.

I thought it best to urge every consideration which might influence a party having other views in that respect, to avoid coming to a collision upon it. I would even urge considerations of humanity. I would say that fisheries, the nature of which was to multiply the means of subsistence to mankind, were usually considered by civilized nations under a sort of special sanction. It was a common practice to have them uninterrupted, even in time of war. He knew, for instance, that the Dutch had been, for centuries, in the practice of fishing upon the coasts of this island, and that they were not interrupted in this occupation even in ordinary times of war. It was to be inferred from this, that, to interdict a fishery, which has been enjoyed for ages, far from being a usual act in the peaceable relations between nations, was an indication of animosity, transcending even the ordinary course of hostility in war. He said that no such disposition was entertained by the British Government; that to show the liberality which they had determined to exercise in this case, he would assure me that the instructions which he had given to the officers on that station had been, not even to interrupt the American fishermen who might have proceeded to those coasts, within the British jurisdiction, for the present year; to allow them to complete their fares, but to give them notice that this privilege could no longer be allowed by Great Britain, and that they must not return the next year. It was not so much the fishing, as the drying and curing on the shores, that had been followed by bad consequences. It happened that our fishermen, by their proximity, could get to the fishing stations sooner in the season than the British, who were obliged to go from Europe, and who, upon arriving there, found all the best fishing places, and drying and curing places, pre-occupied. This had often given rise to disputes and quarrels between them, which in some instances had proceeded even to blows. It had disturbed the peace among the inhabitants on the shores; and, for several years before the war, the complaints to this Government had been so great and so frequent that it had been impossible not to pay regard to them. I said that I had not heard of any such complaints before, but that, as to the disputes arising from the competition of the fishermen, a remedy could, surely, with ease, be found for them, by suitable regulations of the Government; and with regard to the peace of the inhabitants, there could be little difficulty in securing it, as the liberty enjoyed by the American fishermen was limited to unsettled and uninhabited places, unless they could, in the others, obtain the consent and agreement of the inhabitants.

The answer which was so promptly sent to the complaint relative to the warning of the fishing vessels by the captain of the Jaseur, will probably be communicated to you before you will receive this letter. You will see whether it is so precise, as to the limits within which they are determined to adhere to the exclusion of our fishing vessels, as Lord Bathurst's verbal statement of it to me, namely, to the extent of one marine league from their shores. Indeed, it is to the curing and drying upon the shore that they appear to have the strongest objection. But that, perhaps, is because they know that the immediate curing and drying of the fish, as soon as they are taken, is essential to the value, if not to the very prosecution of the fishery. I have no expectation that the arguments used by me either in support of our right, or as to the policy of Great Britain, upon this question, will have any weight here. Though satisfied of their validity myself, I am persuaded it will be upon the determination of the American Government and people to maintain the right that the continuance of its enjoyment will alone depend.

LONDON, September 26, 1815.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of a letter which I have addressed to Lord Bathurst on the subjects referred to in your instructions of 21st July, and concerning which I had, on the 14th instant, an interview with him, the account of which was reported in my last letter. I have not yet received any answer to either of those which I addressed to Lord Castlereagh in relation to the slaves carried away in violation of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Earl Bathurst.
CHARLES STREET, WESTMINSTER,
September 25, 1815.

In the conference with your Lordship, with which I was honored on the 14th instant, I represented to you, conformably to the instructions which I had received from the Government of the United States, the proceedings of several British officers in America, and upon the American coast, marked with characters incompatible not only with those amicable relations which it is the earnest desire of the American Government to restore and to cultivate, but even with the condition of peace which had been restored between the two countries by the Treaty of Ghent.

It was highly satisfactory to be informed that the conduct of Captain Lock, commander of the sloop-of-war Jaseur, in warning American fishing vessels not to come within sixty miles of the coast of His Majesty's possessions in North America, was unauthorized, and that the instructions to the British officers on that station, far from warranting such a procedure, had directed them not even to molest the American fishing vessels which might be found pursuing that occupation during the present year. In offering a just tribute of acknowledgment to the fairness and liberality of these instructions issued from your Lordship's office, there only remained the regret that the execution had been so different from them in spirit, so opposite to them in effect. But, in disavowing the particular act of the officer who had presumed to forbid American fishing vessels from approaching within sixty miles of the American coast, and in assuring me that it had been the intention of this Government, and the instructions given by your Lordship, not even to deprive the American fishermen of any of their accustomed liberties during the present year, your Lordship did also express it as the intention of the British Government to exclude the fishing vessels of the United States; hereafter, from the liberty of fishing within one marine league of the shores of all the British territories in North America, and from that of drying and curing their fish on the unsettled parts of those territories, and, with the consent of the inhabitants, on those parts which have become settled since the Peace of 1783.

I then expressed to your Lordship my earnest hope that this determination had not been irrevocably taken, and stated the instructions which I had received to present to the consideration of His Majesty's Government the grounds upon which the United States conceive those liberties to stand, and upon which they deem that such exclusion cannot be effected without an infringement of the rights of the American people.

In adverting to the origin of these liberties, it will be admitted, I presume, without question, that, from the time of the settlements in North America, which now constitute the United States, until their separation from Great Britain, and their establishment as distinct sovereignties, these liberties of fishing, and of drying and curing fish, had been enjoyed by them in common with the other subjects of the British empire. In point of principle, they were pre-eminently entitled to the enjoyment; and, in point of fact, they had enjoyed more of them than any other portion of the empire; their settlement of the neighboring country having naturally led to the discovery and improvement of these fisheries, and their proximity to the places where they are prosecuted; and the necessities of their condition having led them to the discovery of the most advantageous fishing grounds, and given them facilities in the pursuit of their occupation in those regions which the remoter parts of the empire could not possess. It might be added, that they had contributed their full share, and more than their share, in securing the conquest from France of the provinces on the coasts on which these fisheries were situated.

It was, doubtless, upon considerations such as these, that in the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States of 1783, an express stipulation was inserted, recognising the rights and liberties which had always been enjoyed by the people of the United States in these fisheries, and declaring that they should continue to enjoy the right of fishing on the Grand Bank, and other places of common jurisdiction, and have the liberty of fishing, and of drying and curing their fish within the exclusive British jurisdiction of the North American coasts, to which they had been accustomed whilst themselves formed a part of the British nation. This stipulation was a part of that treaty by which His Majesty acknowledged the United States as free, sovereign, and independent States, and that he treated with them as such.

It cannot be necessary for me to prove, my Lord, that that treaty is not, in its general provisions, one of those which, by the common understanding and usage of civilized nations, is, or can be, considered as annulled by a subsequent war between the same parties. To suppose that it would imply the inconsistency and absurdity of a sovereign and independent State, liable to forfeit its right of sovereignty, by the act of exercising it on a declaration of war. But the very words of the treaty attest that the sovereignty and independence of the United States were not considered or understood as grants from His Majesty. They were taken and expressed as existing before the treaty was made, and as then only first formally recognised and acknowledged by Great Britain.

Precisely of the same nature were the rights and liberties in the fisheries to which I now refer. They were, in no respect, grants from the King of Great Britain to the United States; but the acknowledgment of them as rights and liberties enjoyed before the separation of the two countries, and which it was mutually agreed should continue to be enjoyed under the new relations which were to subsist between them, constituted the essence of the article concerning the fisheries. The very peculiarity of the stipulation is an evidence that it was not, on either side, understood or intended as a grant from one sovereign State to another. Had it been so understood, neither could the United States have claimed, nor would Great Britain have granted, gratuitously, any such concession. There was nothing, either in the state of things, or in the disposition of parties, which could have led to such a stipulation, as on the ground of a grant, without an equivalent, by Great Britain.

Yet such is the ground upon which it appears to have been contemplated as resting by the British Government, when their Plenipotentiaries at Ghent communicated to those of the United States their intentions as to the North American fisheries, viz: "That the British Government did not intend to grant to the United States, gratuitously, the privileges formerly granted by treaty to them, of fishing within the limits of the British sovereignty, and of using the shores of the British territories for purposes connected with the British fisheries."

These are the words in which the notice, given by them, is recorded in the protocol of conference of the 8th of August, 1814. To this notice the American Plenipotentiaries first answered, on the 9th of August, that they had no instructions from their Government to negotiate upon the subject of the fisheries; and afterwards, in their note of 10th November, 1814, they expressed themselves in the following terms:

"In answer to the declaration made by the British Plenipotentiaries respecting the fisheries, the undersigned, referring to what passed in the conference of the 9th of August, can only state that they are not authorized to bring into discussion any of the rights or liberties which the United States have heretofore enjoyed in relation thereto. From their nature, and from the peculiar character of the treaty of 1783, by which they were recognised, no further stipulation has been deemed necessary by the Government of the United States to entitle them to the full enjoyment of all of them."

If the stipulation of the treaty of 1783 was one of the conditions by which His Majesty acknowledged the sovereignty and independence of the United States; if it was the mere recognition of rights and liberties previously existing and enjoyed, it was neither a privilege gratuitously granted, nor liable to be forfeited by the mere existence of a subsequent war. If it was not forfeited by the war, neither could it be impaired by the declaration of Great Britain, that she did not intend to renew the grant. Where there had been no gratuitous concession, there could be none to renew; the rights and liberties of the United States could not be cancelled by the declaration of Great Britain's intentions. Nothing could abrogate them but the renunciation of them by the United States themselves.

Among the articles of that same treaty of 1783, there is one stipulating that the subjects and citizens of both nations shall enjoy, forever, the right of navigating the river Mississippi, from its sources to the ocean. And although, at the period of the negotiations of Ghent, Great Britain possessed no territory upon that river, yet the British Plenipotentiaries, in their first note, considered Great Britain as still entitled to claim the free navigation of it, without offering for it any equivalent. And, afterwards, when offering a boundary line, which would have abandoned every pretension even to any future possession on that river, they still claimed, not only its free navigation, but a right of access to it, from the British dominions in North America, through the territories of the United States. The American Plenipotentiaries, to foreclose the danger of any subsequent misunderstanding and discussion upon either of these points, proposed an article recognising anew the liberties on both sides. In declining to accept it, the British Plenipotentiaries proposed an article engaging to negotiate, in future, for the renewal of both, for equivalents to be mutually granted. This was refused by the American Plenipotentiaries, on the avowed principle that its acceptance would imply the admission on the part of the United States that their liberties in the fisheries, recognised by the treaty of 1783, had been annulled, which they declared themselves in no manner authorized to concede.

Let it be supposed, my Lord, that the notice given by the British Plenipotentiaries, in relation to the fisheries, had been in reference to another article of the same treaty; that Great Britain had declared she did not intend to grant again, gratuitously, the grant in a former treaty of peace, acknowledging the United States as free, sovereign, and independent States; or, that she did not intend to grant, gratuitously, the same boundary line which she had granted in the former treaty of peace: is it not obvious that the answer would have been that the United States needed no new acknowledgment of their independence, nor any new grant of a boundary line?—that, if their independence was to be forfeited, or their boundary line curtailed, it could only be by their own acts of renunciation, or of cession, and not by the declaration of the intentions of another Government? And if this reasoning be just, with regard to the other articles of the treaty of 1783, upon what principle can Great Britain select one article, or a part of one article, and say, this particular stipulation is liable to forfeiture by war, or by the declaration of her will, while she admits the rest of the treaty to be permanent and irrevocable? In the negotiation of Ghent, Great Britain did propose several variations of the boundary line, but she never intimated that she considered the line of the treaty of 1783 as forfeited by the war, or that its variation could be effected by the mere declaration of her intentions. She perfectly understood that no alteration of that line could be effected but by the express assent of the United States; and, when she finally determined to abide by the same line, neither the British nor the American Plenipotentiaries conceived that any new confirmation of it was necessary. The Treaty of Ghent, in every one of its essential articles, refers to that of 1783 as being still in force. The object of all its articles, relative to the boundary, is to ascertain with more precision, and to carry into effect, the provisions of that prior compact. The treaty of 1783 is, by a tacit understanding between the parties, and without any positive stipulation, constantly referred to as the fundamental law of the relations between the two nations. Upon what ground, then, can Great Britain assume that one particular stipulation in that treaty is no longer binding upon her?

Upon this foundation, my Lord, the Government of the United States consider the people thereof as fully entitled, of right, to all the liberties in the North American fisheries which have always belonged to them; which, in the treaty of 1783, were, by Great Britain, recognised as belonging to them; and which they never have, by any act of theirs, consented to renounce. With these views, should Great Britain ultimately determine to deprive them of the enjoyment of these liberties by force, it is not for me to say whether, or for what length of time, they would submit to the bereavement of that which they would still hold to be their unquestionable right. It is my duty to hope that such measures will not be deemed necessary to be resorted to on the part of Great Britain; and to state that, if they should, they cannot impair the right of the people of the United States to the liberties in question, so long as no formal and express assent of theirs shall manifest their acquiescence in the privation.

In the interview with which your Lordship recently favored me, I suggested several other considerations, with the hope of convincing your Lordship that, independent of the question of rigorous right, it would conduce to the substantial interests of Great Britain herself, as well as to the observance of those principles of benevolence and humanity which it is the highest glory of a great and powerful nation to respect, to leave to the American fishermen the participation of those benefits which the bounty of nature has thus spread before them; which are so necessary to their comfort and subsistence; which they have constantly enjoyed hitherto; and which, far from operating as an injury to Great Britain, had the ultimate result of pouring into her lap a great portion of the profits of their hardy and laborious industry; that these fisheries afforded the means of subsistence to a numerous class of people in the United States, whose habit of life had been fashioned to no other occupation, and whose fortunes had allotted them no other possession; that to another, and, perhaps, equally numerous class of our citizens, they afforded the means of remittance and payment for the productions of British industry and ingenuity, imported from the manufactures of this united kingdom; that, by the common and received usages among civilized nations, fishermen were among those classes of human society whose occupations, contributing to the general benefit and welfare of the species, were entitled to a more than ordinary share of protection; that it was usual to spare and exempt them even from the most exasperated conflicts of national hostility; that this nation had, for ages, permitted the fishermen of another country to frequent and fish upon the coasts of this island, without interrupting them, even in times of ordinary war; that the resort of American fishermen to the barren, uninhabited, and, for the great part, uninhabitable rocks on the coasts of Nova Scotia, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and Labrador, to use them occasionally for the only purposes of utility of which they are susceptible, if it must, in its nature, subject British fishermen on the same coasts to the partial inconvenience of a fair competition, yet produces, in its result, advantages to other British interests equally entitled to the regard and fostering care of their sovereign. By attributing to motives derived from such sources as these the recognition of these liberties by His Majesty's Government in the treaty of 1783, it would be traced to an origin certainly more conformable to the fact, and surely more honorable to Great Britain, than by ascribing it to the improvident grant of an unrequited privilege, or to a concession extorted from the humiliating compliance of necessity.

In repeating with earnestness, all these suggestions, it is with the hope that from some, or all of them, His Majesty's Government will conclude the justice and expediency of leaving the North American fisheries in the state in which they have heretofore constantly existed, and the fishermen of the United States unmolested in the enjoyment of their liberties.

LONDON, November 8, 1815.

SIR: Since I had the honor of writing you last, on the 31st ultimo, I have received from Lord Bathurst a note in answer to my letter to him relating to the fisheries; a copy of which is herewith enclosed. I hope shortly to reply to this note, and perceive nothing in it which can render the rights of the United States to the participation in the fisheries in any manner dubious.

It will be for the Government of the United States to determine whether the negotiation proposed by Lord Bathurst will be advisable; and I pray to be honored with the President's instructions on the subject as soon as possible.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

HON. JAMES MONROE, &c.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 30, 1815.

The undersigned, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, had the honor of receiving the letter of the Minister of the United States, dated the 25th ultimo, containing the grounds upon which the United States conceive themselves, at the present time, entitled to prosecute their fisheries within the limits of the British sovereignty, and to use British territories for purposes connected with the fisheries.

A pretension of this kind was certainly intimated on a former occasion, but in a manner so obscure that His Majesty's Government were not enabled even to conjecture the grounds upon which it could be supported.

His Majesty's Government have not failed to give to the argument contained in the letter of the 25th ultimo a candid and deliberate consideration; and, although they are compelled to resist the claim of the United States, when thus brought forward as a question of right, they feel every disposition to afford to the citizens of those States all the liberties and privileges connected with the fisheries which can consist with the just rights and interests of Great Britain, and secure His Majesty's subjects from those undue molestations in their fisheries which they have formerly experienced from citizens of the United States. The Minister of the United States appears, by his letter, to be well aware that Great Britain has always considered the liberty formerly enjoyed by the United States of fishing within British limits, and using British territory, as derived from the third article of the treaty of 1783, and from that alone; and that the claim of an independent State to occupy and use at its discretion any portion of the territory of another, without compensation or corresponding indulgence, cannot rest on any other foundation than conventional stipulation. It is unnecessary to inquire into the motives which might have originally influenced Great Britain in conceding such liberties to the United States, or whether other articles of the treaty wherein these liberties are specified did, or did not, in fact, afford an equivalent for them, because all the stipulations profess to be founded on reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience. If the United States derived from that treaty privileges from which other independent nations not admitted by treaty were excluded, the duration of the privileges must depend on the duration of the instrument by which they were granted; and if the war abrogated the treaty, it determined the privileges. It has been urged, indeed, on the part of the United States, that the treaty of 1783 was of a peculiar character, and that, because it contained a recognition of American independence, it could not be abrogated by a subsequent war between the parties. To a position of this novel nature Great Britain cannot accede. She knows of no exception to the rule, that all treaties are put an end to by a subsequent war between the same parties: she cannot, therefore, consent to give to her diplomatic relations with one State a different degree of permanency from that on which her connexion with all other States depends. Nor can she consider any one State at liberty to assign to a treaty made with her such a peculiarity of character as shall make it, as to duration, an exception to all other treaties, in order to found, on a peculiarity thus assumed, an irrevocable title to all indulgences, which have all the features of temporary concessions.

The Treaty of Ghent has been brought forward by the American Minister as supporting, by its reference to the boundary line of the United States, as fixed by the treaty of 1783, the opinion that the treaty of 1783 was not abrogated by the war. The undersigned, however, cannot observe in any one of its articles any express or implied reference to the treaty of 1783 as still in force. It will not be denied that the main object of the Treaty of Ghent was the mutual restoration of all territory taken by either party from the other during the war. As a necessary consequence of such a stipulation, each party reverted to their boundaries as before the war, without reference to the title by which these possessions were acquired, or to the mode in which their boundaries had been previously fixed. In point of fact, the United States had before acquired possession of territories asserted to depend on other titles than those which Great Britain could confer. The Treaty of Ghent, indeed, adverted, as a fact of possession, to certain boundaries of the United States which were specified in the treaty of 1783; but surely it will not be contended that therefore the treaty of 1783 was not considered at an end.

It is justly stated by the American Minister that the United States did not need a new grant of the boundary line. The war did not arise out of a contested boundary; and Great Britain, therefore, by the act of treating with the United States, recognised that nation in its former dimensions, excepting so far as the jus belli had interfered with them; and it was the object of the Treaty of Ghent to cede such rights to territory as the jus belli had conferred.

Still less does the free navigation of the Mississippi, as demanded by the British negotiators at Ghent, in any manner express or imply the non-abrogation of the treaty of 1783 by the subsequent war. It was brought forward by them as one of many advantages they were desirous of securing to Great Britain; and if in the first instance demanded without equivalent, it left it open to the negotiators of the United States to claim for their Government, in the course of their conferences, a corresponding benefit. The American Minister will recollect that propositions of this nature were at one time under discussion, and that they were only abandoned at the time that Great Britain relinquished her demand to the navigation of the Mississippi. If, then, the demand on the part of Great Britain can be supposed to have given any weight to the present argument of the United States, the abandonment of that demand must have effectually removed it.

It is by no means unusual for treaties containing recognitions and acknowledgments of title, in the nature of perpetual obligation, to contain, likewise, grants of privileges liable to revocation. The treaty of 1783, like many others, contained provisions of different characters—some in their own nature irrevocable, and others of a temporary nature. If it be thence inferred that, because some advantages specified in that treaty would not be put an end to by the war, therefore all the other advantages were intended to be equally permanent, it must first be shown that the advantages themselves are of the same, or at least of a similar character; for the character of one advantage recognised or conceded by treaty can have no connexion with the character of another, though conceded by the same instrument, unless it arises out of a strict and necessary connexion between the advantages themselves. But what necessary connexion can there be between a right to independence and a liberty to fish within British jurisdiction, or to use British territory? Liberties within British limits are as capable of being exercised by a dependent, as by an independent State, and cannot, therefore, be the necessary consequence of independence.

The independence of a State is that which cannot be correctly said to be granted by a treaty, but to be acknowledged by one. In the treaty of 1783, the independence of the United States was certainly acknowledged, not merely by the consent to make the treaty, but by the previous consent to enter into the provisional articles executed in November, 1782. The independence might have been acknowledged without either the treaty or the provisional articles; but, by whatever mode acknowledged, the acknowledgment is, in its own nature, irrevocable. A power of revoking, or even of modifying it, would be destructive of the thing itself; and, therefore, all such power is necessarily renounced when the acknowledgment is made. The war could not put an end to it, for the reason justly assigned by the American Minister, because a nation could not forfeit its sovereignty by the act of exercising it; and for the further reason, that Great Britain, when she declared war on her part against the United States, gave them, by that very act, a new recognition of their independence.

The nature of the liberty to fish within British limits, or to use British territory, is essentially different from the right to independence, in all that may reasonably be supposed to regard its intended duration. The grant of this liberty has all the aspect of a policy temporary and experimental, depending on the use that might be made of it, on the condition of the islands and places where it was to be exercised, and the more general conveniences or inconveniences, in a military, naval, or commercial point of view, resulting from the access of an independent nation to such islands and places.

When, therefore, Great Britain, admitting the independence of the United States, denies their right to the liberties for which they now contend, it is not that she selects from the treaty, articles, or parts of articles, and says, at her own will, this stipulation is liable to forfeiture by war, and that it is irrevocable; but the principle of her reasoning is, that such distinctions arise out of the provisions themselves, and are founded on the very nature of the grants. But the rights acknowledged by the treaty of 1783 are not only distinguishable from the liberties conceded by the same treaty, in the foundation upon which they stand, but they are carefully distinguished in the treaty of 1783 itself. The undersigned begs to call the attention of the American Minister to the wording of the first and third articles, to which he has often referred, for the foundation of his arguments. In the first article, Great Britain acknowledges an independence already expressly recognised by the Powers of Europe and by herself, in her consent to enter into provisional articles, of November, 1782. In the third article, Great Britain acknowledges the right of the United States to take fish on the banks of Newfoundland and other places, from which Great Britain has no right to exclude an independent nation. But they are to have the liberty to cure and dry them in certain unsettled places within His Majesty's territory. If these liberties, thus granted, were to be as perpetual and indefeasible as the rights previously recognised, it is difficult to conceive that the Plenipotentiaries of the United States would have admitted a variation of language so adapted to produce a different impression; and, above all, that they should have admitted so strange a restriction of a perpetual and indefeasible right as that with which the article concludes, which leaves a right so practical and so beneficial as this is admitted to be, dependent on the will of British subjects, in their character of inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the soil, to prohibit its exercise altogether.

It is surely obvious that the word right, is, throughout the treaty, used as applicable to what the United States were to enjoy, in virtue of a recognised independence; and the word liberty to what they were to enjoy, as concessions strictly dependent on the treaty itself.

The right of the United States has been asserted upon other arguments, which appear to the undersigned not altogether consistent with those that had been previously advanced. It has been argued by the Minister of the United States that the treaty of 1783 did not confer upon the United States the liberty of fishing within British jurisdiction, and using British territory, but merely recognised a right which they previously had; and it has been thence inferred that the recognition of this right renders it as perpetual as that of their independence.

If the treaty of 1783 did not confer the liberties in question, the undersigned cannot understand why, in their support, the point should have been so much pressed, that the treaty is in force notwithstanding the subsequent war. If, as stated by the American Minister, the time of the settlement of North America was the origin of the liberties of the United States in respect to the fisheries, and their independence, as recognised in 1783, was, as further argued by him, the mere recognition of rights and liberties previously existing, (which must have been in virtue of their independence,) it would seem to follow that their independence was recognised from the time of the settlement of North America—for no other period can be assigned. The undersigned is totally unable to collect when the American Minister considers the independence of his country to have commenced; yet this is a point of no small importance, if other rights are to be represented as coeval with it, or dependent on it.

As to the origin of these privileges, in point of fact, the undersigned is ready to admit that, so long as the United States constituted a part of the dominions of His Majesty, the inhabitants had the enjoyment of them, as they had of other political and commercial advantages, in common with his Majesty's subjects. But they had, at the same time, in common with His Majesty's other subjects, duties to perform; and when the United States, by their separation from Great Britain, became released from the duties, they became excluded also from the advantages of British subjects. They cannot, therefore, now claim, otherwise than by treaty, the exercise of privileges belonging to them as British subjects, unless they are prepared to admit, on the part of Great Britain, the exercise of the rights which she enjoyed previous to the separation.

If it be contended, on the part of the United States, that, in consequence of having been once a part of the British dominions, they are now entitled, as of right, to all the privileges which they enjoyed as British subjects, in addition to those which they have as an independent people, the undersigned cannot too strongly protest against such a doctrine; and it must become doubly necessary for Great Britain to hesitate in conceding the privileges which are now the subject of discussion, lest, by such a concession, she should be supposed to countenance a principle not less novel than alarming.

But, though Great Britain can never admit the claim of the United States to enjoy those liberties, with respect to the fisheries, as matter of right, she is by no means insensible to some of those considerations with which the letter of the American Minister concludes.

Although His Majesty's Government cannot admit that the claim of the American fishermen to fish within British jurisdiction, and to use the British territory for purposes connected with their fishery, is analogous to the indulgence which has been granted to enemy's subjects engaged in fishing on the high seas, for the purpose of conveying fresh fish to market, yet they do feel that the enjoyment of the liberties, formerly used by the inhabitants of the United States, may be very conducive to their national and individual prosperity, though they should be placed under some modifications; and this feeling operates most forcibly in favor of concession. But Great Britain can only offer the concession in a way which shall effectually protect her own subjects from such obstructions to their lawful enterprises as they too frequently experienced immediately previous to the late war, and which are, from their very nature, calculated to produce collision and disunion between the two States.

It was not of fair competition that His Majesty's Government had reason to complain, but of the preoccupation of British harbors and creeks, in North America, by the fishing vessels of the United States, and the forcible exclusion of British vessels from places where the fishery might be most advantageously conducted. They had, likewise, reason to complain of the clandestine introduction of prohibited goods into the British colonies by American vessels ostensibly engaged in the fishing trade, to the great injury of the British revenue.

The undersigned has felt it incumbent on him thus generally to notice these obstructions, in the hope that the attention of the Government of the United States will be directed to the subject; and that they may be induced, amicably and cordially, to co-operate with His Majesty's Government in devising such regulations as shall prevent the recurrence of similar inconveniences.

His Majesty's Government are willing to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United States for the modified renewal of the liberties in question; and they doubt not that an arrangement may be made satisfactory to both countries, and tending to confirm the amity now so happily subsisting between them.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity of renewing to Mr. Adams the assurances of his high consideration. BATHURST.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, Envoy, &c., at London, to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, January 22, 1816.

I have the honor to enclose my reply to Lord Bathurst's note concerning the fisheries. It has been delayed by an illness which, for several weeks, disabled me from writing.

13 CRAVEN STREET, Jan. 22, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, has received, and communicated to the Government of the United States, the answer of Lord Bathurst to a letter which he had the honor of addressing to his Lordship on the 25th of September last, representing the grounds upon which the American Government consider the people of the United States entitled to all the rights and liberties in, and connected with, the fisheries on the coasts of North America, which had been enjoyed by them previously to the American Revolution, and which, by the third article of the treaty of peace of 1783, were recognised by Great Britain as rights and liberties belonging to them. The reply to Lord Bathurst's note has been delayed by circumstances which it is unnecessary to detail. It is for the Government of the United States alone to decide upon the proposal of a negotiation upon the subject. That they will at all times be ready to agree upon arrangements which may obviate and prevent the recurrence of those inconveniences stated to have resulted from the exercise by the people of the United States of these rights and liberties, is not to be doubted; but as Lord Bathurst appears to have understood some of the observations in the letter of the undersigned as importing inferences not intended by him, and as some of his Lordship's remarks particularly require a reply, it is presumed that, since Lord Castlereagh's return, it will, with propriety, be addressed to him.

It had been stated, in the letter to Lord Bathurst, that the treaty of peace of 1783 between Great Britain and the United States was of a peculiar nature, and bore in that nature a character of permanency, not subject, like many of the ordinary contracts between independent nations, to abrogation by a subsequent war between the same parties. His Lordship not only considers this as a position of a novel nature, to which Great Britain cannot accede, but as claiming for the diplomatic relations of the United States with her a different degree of permanency from that on which her connexions with all other States depend. He denies the right of any one State to assign to a treaty made with her such a peculiarity of character as to make it in duration an exception to all other treaties, in order to found on a peculiarity thus assumed an irrevocable title to all indulgences which (he alleges) have all the features of temporary concessions; and he adds, in unqualified terms, that "Great Britain knows of no exception to the rule that all treaties are put an end to by a subsequent war between the same parties."

The undersigned explicitly disavows every pretence of claiming, for the diplomatic relations between the United States and Great Britain, a degree of permanency different from that of the same relations between either of the parties and all other Powers. He disclaims all pretence of assigning to any treaty between the two nations any peculiarity not founded in the nature of the treaty itself. But he submits to the candor of His Majesty's Government whether the treaty of 1783 was not, from the very nature of its subject-matter, and from the relations previously existing between the parties to it, peculiar? Whether it was a treaty which could have been made between Great Britain and any other nation? And, if not, whether the whole scope and objects of its stipulations were not expressly intended to constitute a new and permanent state of diplomatic relations between the two countries, which would not, and could not, be annulled by the mere fact of a subsequent war between them? And he makes this appeal with the more confidence, because another part of Lord Bathurst's note admits that treaties often contain recognitions and acknowledgments in the nature of perpetual obligation, and because it implicitly admits that the whole treaty of 1783 is of this character, with the exception of the article concerning the navigation of the Mississippi, and a small part of the article concerning the fisheries.

The position that "Great Britain knows of no exception to the rule that all treaties are put an end to by a subsequent war between the same parties" appears to the undersigned not only novel, but unwarranted by any of the received authorities upon the laws of nations; unsanctioned by the practice and usages of sovereign States; quitted, in its tendency, to multiply the incitements to war, and to weaken the ties of peace between independent nations; and not easily reconciled with the admission that treaties not unusually contain, together with articles of a temporary character, liable to revocation, recognitions, and acknowledgments in the nature of perpetual obligation.

A recognition or acknowledgment of title, stipulated by convention, is as much a part of the treaty as any other article; and if all treaties are abrogated by war, the recognitions and acknowledgments contained in them must necessarily be null and void, as much as any other part of the treaty.

If there be no exception to the rule that war puts an end to all treaties between the parties to it, what can be the purpose or meaning of those articles which, in almost all treaties of commerce, are provided expressly for the contingency of war, and which, during the peace, are without operation? On this point, the undersigned would refer Lord Castlereagh to the tenth article of the treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain, where it is thus stipulated: "Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys, which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war, or national differences, be sequestered or confiscated." If war puts an end to all treaties, what could the parties to this engagement intend by making it formally an article of the treaty? According to the principle laid down, excluding all exception, by Lord Bathurst's note, the moment a war broke out between the two countries this stipulation became a dead letter, and either State might have sequestered or confiscated those specified properties, without any violation of compact between the nations.

The undersigned believes that there are many exceptions to the rule by which the treaties between nations are mutually considered as terminated by the intervention of a war; that these exceptions extend to all engagements contracted with the understanding that they are to operate equally in war and peace, or exclusively during war; to all engagements by which the parties superadd the sanction of a formal compact to principles dictated by the eternal laws of morality and humanity; and, finally, to all engagements which, according to the expressions of Lord Bathurst's note, are in the nature of perpetual obligation. To the first and second of these classes may be referred the tenth article of the treaty of 1794, and all treaties or articles of treaties stipulating the abolition of the slave trade. The treaty of peace of 1783 belongs to the third.

The reasoning of Lord Bathurst's note seems to confine this perpetuity of obligation to recognitions and acknowledgments of title, and to consider its perpetual nature as resulting from the subject-matter of the contract, and not from the engagement of the contractor. While Great Britain leaves the United States unmolested in the enjoyment of all the advantages, rights, and liberties stipulated in their behalf in the treaty of 1783, it is immaterial to them whether she founds her conduct upon the mere fact that the United States are in possession of such rights, or whether she is governed by good faith and respect for her own engagements. But if she contests any one of them, it is to her engagements only that the United States can appeal as the rule for settling the question of right. If this appeal be rejected, it ceases to be a discussion of right; and this observation applies as strongly to the recognition of independence, and to the boundary line in the treaty of 1783, as to the fisheries. It is truly observed by Lord Bathurst, that in that treaty the independence of the United States was not granted, but acknowledged. He adds, that it might have been acknowledged without any treaty, and that the acknowledgment, in whatever mode made, would have been irrevocable. But the independence of the United States was precisely the question upon which a previous war between them and Great Britain had been waged. Other nations might acknowledge their independence without a treaty, because they had no right, or claim of right, to contest it; but this acknowledgment, to be binding upon Great Britain, could have been made only by treaty, because it included the dissolution of one social compact between the parties, as well as the formation of another. Peace could exist between the two nations only by the mutual pledge of faith to the new social relations established between them; and hence it was that the stipulations of that treaty were in the nature of perpetual obligation, and not liable to be forfeited by a subsequent war, or by any declaration of the will of either party without the assent of the other.

In this view, it certainly was supposed by the undersigned that Great Britain considered her obligation to hold and treat with the United States as a sovereign and independent Power as derived only from the preliminary articles of 1782, as converted into the definitive treaty of 1783. The boundary line could obviously rest upon no other foundation. The boundaries were neither recognitions nor acknowledgments of title. They could have been fixed and settled only by treaty, and it is to the treaty alone that both parties have always referred in all discussions concerning them. Lord Bathurst's note denies that there is in any one of the articles of the Treaty of Ghent any express or implied reference to the treaty of 1783, as still in force. It says that, by the stipulation for a mutual restoration of territory, each party necessarily "reverted to their boundaries as before the war, without reference to the title by which their possessions were acquired, or to the mode in which their boundaries had been previously fixed."

There are four several articles of the Treaty of Ghent, in every one of which the treaty of 1783 is not only named, but its stipulations form the basis of the new engagements between the parties for carrying its provisions into execution. These articles are the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh. The undersigned refers particularly to the fourth article, where the boundaries described are not adverted to without reference to the title by which they were acquired; but where the stipulation of the treaty of 1783 is expressly assigned as the basis of the claims, both of the United States and of Great Britain, to the islands mentioned in the article.

The words with which the article begins are, "Whereas it was stipulated by the second article in the treaty of peace of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, that the boundary of the United States should comprehend all islands," &c.

It proceeds to describe the boundaries as there stipulated; then alleges the claim of the United States to certain islands, as founded upon one part of the stipulation, and the claim of Great Britain as derived from another part of the stipulation; and agrees upon the appointment of two commissioners "to decide to which of the two contracting parties the islands belong, in conformity with the true intent of the said treaty of peace of 1783." The same expressions are repeated in the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles; and the undersigned is unable to conceive by what construction of language one of the parties to those articles can allege that, at the time when they were signed, the treaty of 1783 was, or could be, considered at an end.

When, in the letter of the undersigned to Lord

Bathurst, the treaty of 1783 was stated to be a compact of a peculiar character, importing in its own nature a permanence not liable to be annulled by the fact of a subsequent war between the parties, the recognition of the sovereignty of the United States and the boundary line were adduced as illustrations to support the principle; the language of the abovementioned articles in the Treaty of Ghent, and the claim brought forward by Great Britain, at the negotiation of it, for the free navigation of the Mississippi, were alleged as proofs that Great Britain herself so considered it, excepting with regard to a small part of the single article relative to the fisheries; and the right of Great Britain was denied thus to select one particular stipulation in such a treaty, and declare it to have been abrogated by the war. The answer of Lord Bathurst denies that Great Britain has made such a selection, and affirms that the whole treaty of 1783 was annulled by the late war. It admits, however, that the recognition of independence and the boundaries was in the nature of perpetual obligation; and that, with the single exception of the liberties in and connected with the fisheries within British jurisdiction on the coasts of North America, the United States are entitled to all the benefits of all the stipulations in their favor contained in the treaty of 1783, although the stipulations themselves are supposed to be annulled. The fishing liberties within British jurisdiction alone are considered as a temporary grant, liable not only to abrogation by war, but, as it would seem from the tenor of the argument, revocable at the pleasure of Great Britain, whenever she might consider the revocation suitable to her interest. The note affirms that "the liberty to fish within British limits, or to use British territory, is essentially different from the right to independence in all that can reasonably be supposed to regard its intended duration; that the grant of this liberty has all the aspect of a policy, temporary and experimental, depending on the use that might be made of it, on the condition of the islands and places where it was to be exercised, and the more general conveniences or inconveniences, in a military, naval, or commercial point of view, resulting from the access of an independent nation to such islands and places."

The undersigned is induced, on this occasion, to repeat his Lordship's own words, because, on a careful and deliberate review of the article in question, he is unable to discover in it a single expression indicating, even in the most distant manner, a policy, temporary or experimental, or having the remotest connexion with military, naval, or commercial conveniences or inconveniences to Great Britain. He has not been inattentive to the variation in the terms, by which the enjoyment of the fisheries on the main ocean, the common possession of both nations, and the same enjoyment within a small portion of the special jurisdiction of Great Britain, are stipulated in the article, and recognised as belonging to the people of the United States. He considers the term right as importing an advantage to be enjoyed in a place of common jurisdiction, and the term liberty as referring to the same advantage, incidentally leading to the borders of a special jurisdiction. But, evidently, neither of them imports any limitation of time. Both were expressions no less familiar to the understandings than dear to the hearts of both the nations parties to the treaty. The undersigned is persuaded it will be readily admitted that, wherever the English language is the mother tongue, the term liberty, far from including in itself either limitation of time or precariousness of tenure, is essentially as permanent as that of right, and can, with justice, be understood only as a modification of the same thing; and as no limitation of time is implied in the term itself, so there is none expressed in any part of the article to which it belongs. The restriction at the close of the article is itself a confirmation of the permanency which the undersigned contends belongs to every part of the article. The intention was, that the people of the United States should continue to enjoy all the benefits of the fisheries which they had enjoyed theretofore, and, with the exception of drying and curing fish on the island of Newfoundland, all that British subjects should enjoy thereafter. Among them, was the liberty of drying and curing fish on the shores, then uninhabited, adjoining certain bays, harbors, and creeks. But, when those shores should become settled, and thereby become private and individual property, it was obvious that the liberty of drying and curing fish upon them must be conciliated with the proprietary rights of the owners of the soil. The same restriction would apply to British fishermen; and it was precisely because no grant of a new right was intended, but merely the continuance of what had been previously enjoyed, that the restriction must have been assented to on the part of the United States. But, upon the common and equitable rule of construction for treaties, the expression of one restriction implies the exclusion of all others not expressed; and thus the very limitation which looks forward to the time when the unsettled deserts should become inhabited, to modify the enjoyment of the same liberty conformably to the change of circumstances, corroborates the conclusion that the whole purport of the compact was permanent and not temporary—not experimental, but definitive.

That the term right was used as applicable to what the United States were to enjoy in virtue of a recognised independence, and the word liberty to what they were to enjoy as concessions strictly dependent on the treaty itself, the undersigned not only cannot admit, but considers as a construction altogether unfounded. If the United States would have been entitled, in virtue of a recognised independence, to enjoy the fisheries to which the word rights is applied, no article upon the subject would have been required in the treaty. Whatever their right might have been, Great Britain would not have felt herself bound, without a specific article to that effect, to acknowledge it as included among the appendages to their independence. Had she not acknowledged it, the United States must have been reduced to the alternative of resigning it, or of maintaining it by force; the result of which must have been war—the very state from which the treaty was to redeem the parties. That Great Britain would not have acknowledged these rights as belonging to the United States in virtue of their independence, is evident; for, in the cession of Nova Scotia by France to Great Britain, in the twelfth article of the Treaty of Utrecht, it was expressly stipulated that, as a consequence of that cession, French subjects should be thenceforth "excluded from all kind of fishing in the said seas, bays, and other places on the coasts of Nova Scotia; that is to say, on those which lie towards the east, within thirty leagues, beginning from the island commonly called Sable, inclusively, and thence stretching along towards the southwest." The same exclusion was repeated, with some slight variation, in the treaty of peace of 1763; and, in the eighteenth article of the same treaty, Spain explicitly renounced all pretensions to the right of fishing "in the neighborhood of the island of Newfoundland." It was not, therefore, as a necessary result of their independence that Great Britain recognised the right of the people of the United States to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, in the "Gulf of St. Lawrence," and at all other places in the sea where "the inhabitants of both countries used, at any time theretofore, to fish." She recognised it, by a special stipulation, as a right which they had theretofore enjoyed as a part of the British nation, and which, as an independent nation, they were to continue to enjoy unmolested; and it is well known that, so far from considering it as recognised by virtue of her acknowledgment of independence, her objections to admitting it at all formed one of the most prominent difficulties in the negotiation of the peace of 1763. It was not asserted by the undersigned, as Lord Bathurst's note appears to suppose, that either the right or the liberty of the people of the United States in these fisheries was indefeasible. It was maintained that, after the recognition of them by Great Britain, in the treaty of 1763, neither the right nor the liberty could be forfeited by the United States, but by their own consent; that no act or declaration of Great Britain alone could divest the United States of them; and that no exclusion of them from the enjoyment of either could be valid, unless expressly stipulated by themselves, as was done by France in the Treaty of Utrecht, and by France and Spain in the peace of 1763.

The undersigned is apprehensive, from the earnestness with which Lord Bathurst's note argues to refute inferences which he disclaims, from the principles asserted in his letter to his Lordship, that he has not expressed his meaning in terms sufficiently clear. He affirmed that, previous to the independence of the United States, their people, as British subjects, had enjoyed all the rights and liberties in the fisheries, which form the subject of the present discussion; and that, when the separation of the two parts of the nation was consummated, by a mutual compact, the Treaty of Peace defined the rights and liberties which, by the stipulation of both parties, the United States in their new character were to enjoy. By the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States, Great Britain bound herself to treat them, thenceforward, as a nation possessed of all the prerogatives and attributes of sovereign power. The people of the United States were, thenceforward, neither bound in allegiance to the Sovereign of Great Britain, nor entitled to his protection, in the enjoyment of any of their rights, as his subjects. Their rights and their duties, as members of a State, were defined and regulated by their own constitutions and forms of government. But there were certain rights and liberties which had been enjoyed by both parts of the nation, while subjects of the same sovereign, which it was mutually agreed they should continue to enjoy unmolested; and, among them, were the rights and liberties in those fisheries. The fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland, as well in the open seas as in the neighboring bays, gulfs, and along the coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador, were, by the dispensations and the laws of nature, in substance, only different parts of one fishery. Those of the open sea were enjoyed not as a common and universal right of all nations; since the exclusion from them of France and Spain, in whole or in part, had been expressly stipulated by those nations, and no other nation had, in fact, participated in them. It was, with some exceptions, an exclusive possession of the British nation; and in the Treaty of Separation it was agreed that the rights and liberties in them should continue to be enjoyed by that part of the nation which constituted the United States; that it should not be a several, but, as between Great Britain and the United States, a common fishery. It was necessary, for the enjoyment of this fishery, to exercise it in conformity to the habits of the species of game of which it consisted. The places frequented by the fish were those to which the fishermen were obliged to resort, and these occasionally brought them to the borders of the British territorial jurisdiction. It was also necessary, for the prosecution of a part of this fishery, that the fish, when caught, should be immediately cured and dried, which could only be done on the rocks or shores adjoining the places where they were caught; the access to these rocks and shores, for those purposes, was secured to the people of the United States, as incidental and necessary to the enjoyment of the fishery; it was little more than an access to naked rocks and desolate sands; but it was as permanently secured as the right to the fishery itself. No limitation was assigned of time. Provision was made for the proprietary rights which might at a distant and future period arise by the settlement of places then uninhabited; but no other limitation was expressed or indicated by the terms of the treaty, and no other can, either from the letter or spirit of the article, be inferred.

Far, then, from claiming the general rights and privileges belonging to British subjects within the British dominions, as resulting from the Treaty of Peace of 1763, while at the same time asserting their exemption from the duties of a British allegiance, the article in question is itself a proof that the people of the United States have renounced all such claims. Could they have pretended generally to the privileges of British subjects, such an article as that relating to the fisheries would have been absurd. There was in the treaty of 1763 no express renunciation of their rights to the protection of a British Sovereign. This renunciation they had made by their declaration of independence on the 4th of July, 1776; and it was implied in their acceptance of the counter-renunciation of sovereignty in the treaty of 1763. It was precisely because they might have lost their portion of this joint national property, to the acquisition of which they had contributed more than their share, unless a formal article of the treaty should secure it to them, that the article was introduced. By the British municipal laws, which were the laws of both nations, the property of a fishery is not necessarily in the proprietor of the soil where it is situated. The soil may belong to one individual, and the fishery to another. The right to the soil may be exclusive, while the fishery may be free, or held in common. And thus, while in the partition of the national possessions in North America, stipulated by the treaty of 1763, the jurisdiction over the shores washed by the waters where this fishery was placed was reserved to Great Britain, the fisheries themselves, and the accommodations essential to their prosecution, were, by mutual compact, agreed to be continued in common.

In submitting these reflections to the consideration of His Majesty's Government, the undersigned is duly sensible to the amicable and conciliatory sentiments and dispositions towards the United States manifested at the conclusion of Lord Bathurst's note, which will be met by reciprocal and corresponding sentiments and dispositions on the part of the American Government. It will be highly satisfactory to them to be assured that the conduciveness of the object to the national and individual prosperity of the inhabitants of the United States operates with His Majesty's Government as a forcible motive to concession. Undoubtedly, the participation in the liberties of which their right is now maintained, is far more important to the interests of the people of the United States than the exclusive enjoyment of them can be to the interests of Great Britain. The real, general, and ultimate interests of both the nations on this object, he is fully convinced are the same. The collision of particular interests which heretofore may have produced altercations between the fishermen of the two nations, and the clandestine introduction of prohibited goods by means of American fishing vessels, may be obviated by arrangements duly concerted between the two Governments. That of the United States, he is persuaded, will readily co-operate in any measure to secure those ends compatible with the enjoyment by the people of the United States of the liberties to which they consider their title as unimpaired, inasmuch as it has never been renounced by themselves.

The undersigned prays Lord Castlereagh to accept the renewed assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

LORD VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH.

LONDON, Jan. 31, 1816.

In my interview with Lord Castlereagh on the 25th instant we had much conversation, as well upon the topics which have formed the subjects of discussion with this Government during his absence, as upon those concerning which I have recently been honored with your instructions. As propositions for a formal negotiation had been made on both sides, I thought it necessary to ascertain whether this Government would consider the full power under which I had acted jointly with my late colleagues as yet sufficient for concluding with me any further conventional arrangements. At the time when we signed the commercial convention of the 3d July last, we had given notice that the objects upon which we had been instructed to treat under that full power, were much more extensive than those upon which we found it then practicable to come to an agreement; but as the British Plenipotentiaries informed us that their powers would terminate on the conclusion of that convention, I told them that I should make no further propositions, unless by virtue of subsequent instructions from my own Government; and, in that case, should address them in the ordinary channel of the Foreign Department. I now inquired of Lord Castlereagh whether this Government was now disposed to enter upon a further negotiation, and, if they were, whether they would expect me to produce a new full power? With regard to the latter point, Lord Castlereagh said, that if I should declare that the Government of the United States still considered the joint power under which I had treated heretofore as in force, to authorize me to treat separately, and that the proposals which I should make were by the instructions of my Government, he thought it would not be necessary for me to produce a new power. As this answer is not perfectly explicit, and as it requires of me a declaration of what I must rather infer than positively know, I would request, as the safest course, that a new full power may be transmitted to me.

Lord Castlereagh inquired what were the subjects upon which we should be desirous of treating. I mentioned, as the first and most important, that which relates to seamen; observing, the great anxiety which was felt in the United States on this subject, the principal source of the late contest between the two countries, and that from which the greatest danger of future dissensions was to be apprehended, unless some provision should be made during the peace to prevent the recurrence of the same evils whenever a new war may take place.

I noticed the new recommendation in the President's Message to Congress, of a law for confining the navigation of American vessels to American seamen, and the solicitude manifested by the President that it may lead to the total discontinuance of the practice of impressment in our vessels. Lord Castlereagh expressed his satisfaction, at what he termed this change of policy on the part of the United States; but, far from appearing to think it a motive for Great Britain to stipulate by treaty to forbear the practice of impressment, he intimated the opinion that this measure of the United States, if fairly adopted, and properly carried into execution, would rather make any arrangement between the two nations unnecessary. He said that its consequences must be, that there would be no British seamen on board of American vessels to take, and, if so, that the practice of taking them would cease of course. He remarked that, as the inconvenience did not exist during peace, it might be doubted whether it was the most seasonable time for a discussion, upon which there was such a different and opposite view in point of principle entertained by the two Governments. And, although I urged that the time of peace, when there was no immediate interest of either party at stake, and when the feelings on both sides would be cool and composed, might be peculiarly adapted to a mutual effort for closing this fruitful source of dissensions, he was not inclined to that opinion. He intimated that there was still in England a very strong and highly irritable feeling on this subject; that the Government could not incur the responsibility of concession in relation to it; that it would be inexpedient to wait until the new policy of the United States for encouraging their own native seamen should fully have been developed, and, by its consequences, have proved that Great Britain would not need impressment to preserve herself from the loss of her own seamen. He added, nevertheless, that the British Government would always be ready to hear proposals on this subject, and to adopt arrangements which might guard against abuses in the exercise of their rights.

I shall give you, in my next, the sequel of this conference, the result of which has confirmed all the opinions, with regard to the policy of this Government, which I gave you in my last despatch. There appears to me no prospect that, under the present ministry, any conventional arrangement for renouncing the practice of impressment will be attainable; and you will observe the new argument which Lord Castlereagh derives against such a stipulation, from the measures recommended by the President for excluding foreign seamen from our service. There is no immediate prospect of any maritime war, nor, indeed, any remote discernible prospect of such a war, with the United States neutral to it. As the occurrence, however, is not impossible, and as the outrage of that practice can never be tolerated by a nation of the strength and resources to which the United States are rising, it cannot too forcibly be urged upon their conviction, that the only means of protecting their seafaring citizens in the enjoyment of their rights, will consist in the energy with which they shall be asserted.

LONDON, February 8, 1816.

In relation to the fisheries little was said. He told me that he had, the evening before, read my note to him concerning them; that the British Government would adhere to their principle respecting the treaty, and to the exclusive rights of their territorial jurisdiction; but that they had no wish to prevent us from fishing, and would readily enter into a negotiation for an arrangement on this subject.

[NOTE.—See ante, for Mr. Adams's letters of 17th February, 1816, to the Secretary of State and Lord Castlereagh.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 27, 1816.

SIR: It being represented, by your letter of the 8th of November, that the British Government was disposed to regulate, in concert with the United States, the taking of fish on the coasts, bays, and creeks, of all His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and the curing and drying of fish by their citizens on the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador, in such manner as to promote the interest of both nations, you will consider this letter an authority and instruction to negotiate a convention for these purposes.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 27, 1816.

SIR: Since my last, of the 10th of December, I have had the honor to receive your letter of November 21, with those of the 12th, 19th, 26th and 30th of September, the 7th and 31st of October, and 8th of November. With the latter, a copy of Lord Bathurst's reply to your note of September 25, on the fisheries, was likewise received.

It appears by these communications that although the British Government denies our right of taking, curing, and drying fish within their jurisdiction, and on the coast of the British provinces in North America, it is willing to secure to our citizens the liberty stipulated by the Treaty of 1783, under such regulations as will secure the benefit to both parties, and will likewise prevent the smuggling of goods into the British provinces by our vessels engaged in the fisheries.

It is hoped that the reply which you intimate you intended giving to Lord Bathurst's note may have produced some change in the sentiments of the British Government on this interesting subject; it is, nevertheless, thought proper to enclose you an instruction, to be shown to the British Government, authorizing you to negotiate a convention providing for the objects contemplated.

It is very important that this trust should be executed in a manner not to weaken our right, which, it is presumed, may be done with the concurrence of the British Government, either by the reservation of mutual rights, or making the instrument a remedy for abuses.

As to the manner in which the injuries complained of by the British Government are to be remedied, you will be able, in aid of your own knowledge of the subject, to obtain better information than I can communicate.

The British project will show the nature and extent of these injuries, and it will be your object to make the remedy as harmless to our citizens and as safe to the public rights as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 24, 1816.

A hope is entertained that you will have arranged with the British Government the difference respecting the fisheries before this reaches you. Should you not have been able to do it, you will endeavor to comprise it in the general arrangement which you are authorized to make, on the principles stated in my letter of the 27th of February.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 8, 1816.

Mr. Bagot has received a power to arrange the difference respecting the taking, and curing, and drying fish on the shores of the British colonies; but whether it authorizes such an arrangement as will be useful and satisfactory to us, I am as yet uninformed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Aug. 13, 1816.

On the other subject [the fisheries] Mr. Bagot offered to secure to us the right in question on the Labrador shore, between Mount Joli and the Bay of Esquimaux, near the entrance of the strait of Belleisle. It was necessary for me to seek detailed information of the value of this accommodation from those possessing it at Marblehead and elsewhere, which I did; the result of which was, that it would be more for our advantage to commence at the last-mentioned point, and to extend the right, eastward, through the Strait of Belleisle, as far along the Labrador coast as possible. To this he objected; offering, then, an alternative on the shore of the island of Newfoundland, to commence at Cape Ray, and extend, east, to the Ramea islands. Of the value of this coast I am likewise ignorant. The negotiation must, therefore, be again suspended until I obtain the information requisite to enable me to act in it.

Relations with Great Britain.

It is probable that the arrangement of these two interests will again rest with you. The advantage of it, as you are already authorized to treat on other important subjects, is obvious.

At the commencement of our conferences, Mr. Bagot informed me of an order which had been issued by Admiral Griffith to the British cruisers, to remove our fishing vessels from the coasts of those provinces, which he would endeavor to have revoked pending the negotiation. His attempt succeeded. I shall endeavor to have this revocation extended, so as to afford the accommodation desired until the negotiation is concluded. All the information which has been, or may be, obtained on this subject shall be transmitted to you.

LONDON, August 24, 1816.

On Wednesday last I had an interview with Lord Castlereagh, in which he informed me that this Government declined entering upon any negotiation relative to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies; that they were averse to any discussion relative to blockades, and the other conflicting pretensions of neutral and belligerent rights; and that they were willing to receive any proposals that we may wish to offer respecting the intercourse by land between the United States and the British continental colonies, and respecting seamen; but there was a manifest reluctance to negotiate even upon these points. With regard to the West Indies, he said it was understood by this Government that the United States would be perfectly free to adopt any countervailing regulations, either of prohibition or of additional duties, that they might think advisable; that Great Britain would have no right to complain of them; that the determination in this instance arose altogether from that of adhering to their colonial system, of the wisdom of which he spoke as being, in his own mind, not unquestionable, but from which it was not thought expedient now to depart.

LONDON, September 18, 1816.

You will perceive, by all my late despatches, that there is no prospect of doing anything here in the way of a negotiation upon objects of commerce. I addressed yesterday to Lord Castlereagh a note, renewing the proposal to negotiate; the object of which is to have the refusal explicitly signified in writing. In my last interview with Lord Castlereagh he did unequivocally decline negotiation upon the trade between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, and upon all the questions relating to neutral rights in time of maritime war. He said they were willing to receive any proposition respecting seamen, and respecting the inland intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in North America. I told him I should repeat the proposal for treating in a note. He expressed a wish that I would not mention in the note the neutral questions at all. I was somewhat surprised at the objection, but promised him I would give it full consideration before I sent in the note. I did accordingly take ample time for reflection, and have concluded that I ought not only to include them in the note, but to urge with earnestness the reasons which make it peculiarly desirable that the two Governments should come to an understanding upon those points before the recurrence of a maritime war.

LONDON, September 27, 1816.

I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of the note which I have addressed to Lord Castlereagh, renewing the proposal for the negotiation of a treaty of commerce. From the determination of this Government, as communicated to me in my personal interview with him on the 21st of August, it is to be expected that they will decline treating upon the subject of our trade with the British colonies in the West Indies, and upon the questions relating to neutral interests during maritime war. They may profess to be willing to receive specific proposals relative to seamen, and to our inland intercourse with their colonies in North America, but it is not probable that upon either of those subjects they will agree to anything that can be satisfactory to you; nor shall I think it expedient to conclude any separate arrangement concerning them, excluding the others, without further instructions to that effect. In the conversations that I have had with Lord Castlereagh, he has given me very distinctly to understand that, with regard to seamen, if they should even agree to the proposed stipulation of excluding from the respective naval and merchant services the native citizens and subjects of each other, they will not understand it as implying or intending an engagement to renounce the practice of taking men from our vessels in the event of a future maritime war. In the instructions hitherto transmitted to me, it is not insisted that such a renunciation should be included in the article; yet I cannot but suppose it was expected that, if the article should be agreed to, it would be with at least a tacit understanding that the practice of impressment shall be abandoned.

13 CRAVEN STREET, Sept. 17, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, has the honor of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the proposal which he has been instructed to make, on the part of the Government of the United States, for the negotiation of a treaty of commerce, embracing all the principal objects most interesting to the friendly and commercial intercourse between the two nations. He has already exhibited to his Lordship the authority with which he has been furnished by the American Government for that purpose, and has fully stated to him the motives which induced this proposal. They are all founded in the anxious desire of the American Government to cultivate the harmony between the two nations, and to concert, by engagements of mutual accommodation, such arrangements of the points from which differences have unfortunately arisen heretofore, or which might have a tendency to produce them hereafter, as may be satisfactory to both parties, guard against future misunderstandings, and promote that amicable temper and disposition which can alone perpetuate the peace and friendship dictated by the clearest and highest interests both of Great Britain and of the United States.

It will be recollected by Lord Castlereagh that the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815, was not considered at the time of its conclusion as the ultimate or definitive arrangement of the commercial relations between the high contracting parties. Other objects, besides those upon which the agreement was completed, were discussed in the course of that negotiation. Others yet, including all or most of those upon which Great Britain is now again invited to treat, were presented to the attention of the British Plenipotentiaries, but postponed, in consideration of peculiar circumstances then operating, and which have happily since been done away. In bringing them again to the view of the British Cabinet, the undersigned has the honor of distinctly specifying the several objects upon which the American Government repeats the proposal to enter into further reciprocal commercial stipulations, of suggesting the urgent additional motives for desiring them which have arisen since that period, and of exposing the liberal principles upon which they propose that this supplementary treaty should be founded.

1. The commerce between the United States and the British colonies in North America and in the West Indies.

From the relative geographical position of those countries; from the nature of their respective productions; and from the wants on either side, which may be most advantageously, if not exclusively, supplied by the other, this commerce is not only of the greatest convenience to both parties, but, in some respects, and on many occasions, it is of the first necessity to the colonies. At the time when the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815, was negotiated, this commerce was open to vessels of the United States. The ports of the British colonies in the West Indies are still accessible, under certain restrictions, to French, Spanish, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish vessels; and while the ports of every nation in the West Indies (Great Britain alone excepted) are in like manner accessible to American vessels, they have been, and still are, by new regulations, enforced since the conclusion of that convention, rigorously excluded from the British ports. This exclusion of all participation in the advantage of carrying between the two countries the articles of a commerce mutually beneficial to both parties, has not only the aspect of a policy peculiarly pointed against the United States, but it defeats, in a great degree, the principle of equalizing the advantages of the commerce between the two countries, by equalizing the duties and charges upon the vessels of both, in the direct intercourse between them; for while British vessels, after performing a direct voyage from Europe to the United States, are there received upon terms of equality with those of the United States, they now enjoy the exclusive benefit of resorting to an intermediate market in the West Indies, while the vessels of the United States are restricted to the direct interchange to and from Europe. The result of which is, that British vessels enjoy in the ports of the United States important advantages, even over the vessels of the United States themselves. It must be obvious that this cannot long be tolerated; that, if the commerce with those parts of the British dominions be not placed on a footing of reciprocity, similar restraints will become indispensable on the part of the United States. Such countervailing restraints were proposed at the last session of Congress, and postponed, in the hope that satisfactory arrangements might be made, before the next meeting, to prevent a recurrence to a system of commercial hostility, inconsistent with the interests of both nations, inauspicious to the amicable relations now existing between them, and repugnant to the most earnest wishes of the American Government. In the arrangements proposed, they do not contemplate any interference, on their part, with the colonial monopoly of Great Britain. It is not asked that she should renounce the right of prohibiting the importation into her colonies, from the United States, of whatever articles she may think fit; but that the commerce which, for their and her own advantage, Great Britain allows between them and the United States, should be placed on the same footing of reciprocity as the direct trade between Great Britain and the United States was intended to be placed by the convention of 3d July, 1815.

While on this subject, the undersigned cannot but remark the extraordinary measures relating to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in North America and in the West Indies, adopted since the conclusion of the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815. In all of them, very heavy duties have been imposed upon the importation of American produce, even when carried in British ships. A heavy duty of exportation has been laid, in the province of Nova Scotia, upon plaster of Paris, an article for which there is no other market than the United States. And in the province of Upper Canada, an act of the Provincial Legislature having first vested in the Lieutenant Governor and Council the power of regulating the commercial intercourse between that province and the United States, that body did, on the 18th of April last, issue an order, imposing heavy duties upon many articles of the growth or manufacture of the United States, with an addition of twelve per cent. on all those duties upon importation in American vessels, and a tonnage duty of twelve shillings and six pence per ton upon every vessel exceeding five tons burden entering any port or harbor of the province, and belonging to citizens of the United States. The inland commerce between the United States and Upper Canada is believed to be of paramount importance to the province; but, were it even equally important to the United States, measures like these can be viewed in no other light than as efforts to engross, exclusively, the whole of the trade on one side. It would be far more agreeable to the American Government to settle this intercourse by amicable concert, than to be left under the necessity of meeting a system of exclusion by countervailing regulations.

2. Seamen.

It is proposed to stipulate that neither the United States nor Great Britain shall employ, in their naval or merchant service, native citizens or subjects of the other party, with the exception of those already naturalized, of whom the number is very small. From the well known fact that the wages of seamen, in time of peace, are invariably higher in the American service, of both descriptions, than in the British, it is apparent that the advantage of this stipulation will be almost entirely on the side of Great Britain. Although obviously proper that it should be reciprocal, it is offered, not as an engagement from which the United States expect to derive any advantage, in itself, but as the means to Great Britain of reserving to herself the services of all her own native seamen, and of removing forever the necessity of resorting to means of force, either by her naval officers, to take men from the vessels of the United States, or by the United States, to resist the renewal of that practice, in the event of any future maritime war to which they may be neutral. In adopting the principle proposed, the American Government are prepared to secure its faithful execution by any reciprocal regulation which may be deemed necessary, consistent with their constitution and the spirit of their laws.

3. Neutral and belligerent rights.

It is equally desirable, in the view of the American Government, to arrange, at this time, every question relating to neutral rights, particularly those concerning blockade; contraband of war; visits at sea of merchant vessels by ships of war; the trade with the colonies of enemies, and between them and the parent country, and the trade from one port of an enemy to another. The tendency of discordant principles upon these points to embroil neutral and belligerent States with each other has been shown by the melancholy experience of ages. The frequent departures, during the most recent wars, from all acknowledge principles founded on the general usages of nations, have still more unsettled whatever reliance might heretofore have been placed upon their authority. A time of peace, when the feelings of both parties are free from the excitement of any momentary interest, and when the operation of the principles to be sanctioned by mutual compact depends upon contingencies which may give either party the first claim to the stipulated rights of the belligerent or of the neutral, must be more favorable to the amicable adjustment of these questions than a time of actual war, under circumstances when the immediate interests of each party are engaged in opposition to those of the other. Whether Great Britain or the United States will be first engaged in a maritime war with any third party, cannot now be foreseen; but it is of the deepest interest to the permanency of peace and friendship between them that they should come to an explicit understanding with each other upon the points here referred to, before the occurrence of any such event on either side. It is not the desire of the American Government to propose, upon these subjects, any innovation upon principles often recognised by Great Britain herself, in her treaties with other Powers. They wish only, by a mutual compact now formed, to guard against the collisions, which the recollection of the past so forcibly admonishes the rulers of both nations to obviate, if possible, for the future.

4. Slaves carried away from the United States, by British officers, after the peace.

As the construction given by His Majesty's Government to the first article in the Treaty of Ghent, in reference to the slaves carried away from the United States by British officers, after the ratification of the peace, is so directly at variance with the construction which the American Government think alone applicable to it, the undersigned has been further instructed to propose that this question should be submitted to the decision of some friendly sovereign. This reference is suggested by provisions in the Treaty of Ghent itself, applicable to the contingency of differences in other instances; and it is conceived that, when such differences exist, no better mode can be adopted for settling them in a satisfactory manner.

Should His Majesty's Government think proper to accept this proposal for a negotiation, upon the points with regard to which the general wishes of the Government of the United States have been here frankly exposed, the undersigned will be ready to enter into further communications with any person who may be authorized to confer with him for the purpose of such a negotiation. If the offer should not be deemed acceptable, he requests the honor of as early an answer as may be convenient.

The undersigned prays Lord Castlereagh to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

LORD CASTLEREAGH.

LONDON, October 5, 1816.

Lord Castlereagh left London this week upon a visit to Ireland. Previous to his departure I received from him a letter, of which a copy is herewith enclosed. Although the absence of several of the Cabinet Ministers is alleged as the motive for postponing the answer to my note of the 17th September, and although his Lordship promises to lay the subject suggested in it before his colleagues immediately after his return, there is no reason to expect that any departure from the policy already determined upon will take place. It is probable that you will receive this despatch about the time of the meeting of Congress. Any measures in the spirit, and with the object of those proposed at the last session, and then postponed, may be now adopted without hesitation. My own entire conviction is, that the operation of such measures, will be the only possible means of convincing this Government of the expediency of relaxing from the rigor of their exclusive colonial system. It is, and uniformly has been, my opinion, that the result of the equalization of duties will be to the advantage of Great Britain, and to our disadvantage. But the principle was sanctioned by an act of Congress before the convention of 3d July, 1815 was negotiated. The benefit of the convention to us, if any, is in the India trade; but as its duration is to be so short, the only chance of having it renewed, at the end of its four years, with additional articles of more liberality, will be effective counteracting regulations in respect to the commerce with the British colonies in the West Indies.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Adams, dated

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 28, 1816.

SIR: I very much regret that the absence from London at this season of the year of several of the Prince Regent's Ministers will preclude me from returning as early an answer to your note of the 17th as I should wish, under the sense I entertain of the great importance of the several objects to which it invites the attention of this Government.

I have myself obtained the permission of the Prince Regent to make a short excursion to Ireland on my private affairs, but I shall certainly return to London by the middle of November, and shall lose no time, as soon after that period as my colleagues shall be reassembled, to bring the various objects referred to in your note under their deliberation.

I request you will accept the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

LONDON, December 24, 1816.

Yesterday morning I received a note from Lord Castlereagh requesting me to call upon him; and he informed me that, as he was going out of town for a few days, he had sent for me to say that he had not forgotten his promise to me before his departure for Ireland; that the proposal in my note of 27th September for a commercial negotiation should be considered immediately after his return; that two cabinet councils had already been held on the subject, and, as soon as the objects could be sufficiently matured for the proper authority to be given to him to treat, I should hear from him again. It would seem from this, as if the proposal would be so far accepted as to enter upon a negotiation; but I beg leave to point your attention to an article in the Courier of last evening, stating the proceeding in the island of Dominica, after the late hurricane, including a letter from Earl Bathurst, dated the 28th of September last, and an advertisement from the Victualling Office, for a supply of flour, to be delivered at several of the West India islands, from the United States; both in the same paper.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 5, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to forward to you, herewith, a copy of my correspondence with Mr. Bagot, in relation to the fisheries on the coast of Labrador, &c.; from which you will perceive that our negotiation on that interesting subject has not had the desired result.

Mr. Bagot professes, on the part of his Government, the most conciliatory disposition in regard to this affair, and it is yet to be hoped that it may be satisfactorily settled. With this view, the President intends to renew the negotiation as soon as he can obtain the information necessary to enable him to decide what arrangement would be best calculated to reconcile the interests of both parties, which he hopes to do in the course of a few months. In the mean time, he expects that no measures will be taken by the British Government to alter the existing state of things, and that it will be in your power to obtain the renewal of the order to the naval officer commanding on that station not to interrupt or disturb our fishermen during the approaching season.

You will see the importance of an early attention to this subject, as the fishing season is fast approaching. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Monroe.

WASHINGTON, November 27, 1816.

SIR: In the conversation which I had with you a few days ago, upon the subject of the negotiation into which the British Government is willing to enter, for the purpose of affording to the citizens of the United States such accommodation for their fishery, within the British jurisdiction, as may be consistent with the proper administration of His Majesty's dominions, you appeared to apprehend that neither of the propositions which I had the honor to make to you upon this subject would be considered as affording in a sufficient degree the advantages which were deemed requisite.

In order that I may not fail to make the exact nature of these propositions clearly understood, and that I may fully explain the considerations by which they have been suggested, it may perhaps be desirable that I should bring under one view the substance of what I have already had the honor of stating to you in the several conferences which we have held upon this business.

It is not necessary for me to advert to the discussion which has taken place between Earl Bathurst and Mr. Adams. In the correspondence which has passed between them, you will have already seen, in the notes of the former, a full exposition of the grounds upon which the liberty of drying and fishing within the British limits, as granted to the citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1783, was considered to have ceased with the war, and not to have been revived by the late treaty of peace.

You will also have seen therein detailed the serious considerations affecting not only the prosperity of the British fishery, but the general interests of the British dominions, in matters of revenue as well as government, which made it incumbent upon His Majesty's Government to oppose the renewal of so extensive and injurious a concession, within the British sovereignty, to a foreign State, founded upon no principle of reciprocity or adequate compensation whatever. It has not been thought necessary to furnish me with additional argument upon this point. I therefore confine myself, upon the present occasion, to a brief repetition of what I have already, at different periods, had the honor to submit to your consideration upon the subject of an arrangement by which it is hoped practically to reconcile the different views of our respective Governments.

It will be in your recollection that, early in the month of July last, I had the honor to acquaint you that I had received instructions from my Government to assure you that, although it had been felt necessary to resist the claim which had been advanced by Mr. Adams, the determination had not been taken in any unfriendly feeling towards America, or with any illiberal wish to deprive her subjects of adequate means of engaging in the fisheries; but that, on the contrary, many of the considerations which had been urged by Mr. Adams, on behalf of the American citizens formerly engaged in this occupation, had operated so forcibly in favor of granting to them such a concession as might be consistent with the just rights and interests of Great Britain, that I had been furnished with full powers from His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to conclude an arrangement upon the subject, which it was hoped might at once offer to the United States a pledge of His Royal Highness's good will, and afford to them a reasonable participation of those benefits of which they had formerly the enjoyment.

It being the object of the American Government, that, in addition to the right of fishery, as declared by the first branch of the fourth article of the treaty of 1783 permanently to belong to the citizens of the United States, they should also enjoy the privilege of having an adequate accommodation, both in point of harbors and drying ground, on the unsettled coasts within the British sovereignty, I had the honor to propose to you that that part of the southern coast of Labrador which extends from Mount Joli, opposite the eastern end of the island of Anticosti, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to the bay and isles Esquimaux, near the western entrance of the straits of Belleisle, should be allotted for this purpose; it being distinctly agreed that the fishermen should confine themselves to the unsettled parts of the coast, and that all pretensions to fish or dry within the maritime limits, or on any other of the coasts of British North America, should be abandoned.

Upon learning from you, some weeks afterwards, that, from the information which you had received upon the subject of this coast, you were apprehensive that it would not afford, in a sufficient degree, the advantages required, I did not delay to acquaint you that I was authorized to offer another portion of coast, which it was certainly not so convenient to the British Government to assign, but which they would nevertheless be willing to assign, and which, from its natural and local advantages, could not fail to afford every accommodation of which the American fishermen could stand in need. I had then the honor to propose to you as an alternative, that, under similar conditions, they should be admitted to that portion of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray eastward to the Ramea islands, or to about the longitude of 57° west of Greenwich.

The advantages of this portion of coast are accurately known to the British Government; and, in consenting to assign it to the uses of the American fishermen, it was certainly conceived that an accommodation was afforded as ample as it was possible to concede, without abandoning that control within the entire of His Majesty's own harbors and coasts which the essential interests of His Majesty's dominions required. That it should entirely satisfy the wishes of those who have for many years enjoyed, without restraint, the privilege of using for similar purposes all the unsettled coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador, is not to be expected; but, in estimating the value of the proposal, the American Government will not fail to recollect that it is offered without any equivalent, and notwithstanding the footing upon which the navigation of the Mississippi has been left by the Treaty of Ghent, and the recent regulations by which the subjects of His Majesty have been deprived of the privileges, which they so long enjoyed, of trading with the Indian nations within the territory of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES BAGOT.

HON. JAMES MONROE,
Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Bagot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 30, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 27th of November and to submit it to the consideration of the President.

In providing for the accommodation of the citizens of the United States engaged in the fisheries on the coast of His Britannic Majesty's colonies, on conditions advantageous to both parties, I concur in the sentiment that it is desirable to avoid a discussion of their respective rights, and to proceed, in a spirit of conciliation, to examine what arrangement will be adequate to the object. The discussion which has already taken place between our Governments has, it is presumed, placed the claim of each party in a just light. I shall, therefore, make no remark on that part of your note which relates to the right of the parties, other than by stating that this Government entered into this negotiation on the equal ground of neither claiming nor making any concession in that respect.

You have made two propositions, the acceptance of either of which must be attended with the relinquishment of all other claims on the part of the United States, founded on the first branch of the fourth article of the treaty of 1783. In the first, you offer the use of the territory on the Labrador coast, lying between Mount Joli and the bay of Esquimaux, near the entrance of the strait of Belleisle; and, in the second, of such part of the southern coast of the island of Newfoundland as lies between Cape Ray and the Ramea islands.

I have made every inquiry that circumstances have permitted, respecting both these coasts, and find that neither would afford to the citizens of the United States the essential accommodation which is desired; neither having been much frequented by them heretofore, nor likely to be in future. I am compelled, therefore, to decline both propositions.

I regret that it has not been in my power to give an earlier answer to your note; you will, however, have the goodness to impute the delay to a reluctance to decline any proposition which you had made, by the order of your Government, for the arrangement of an interest of such high importance to both nations, and to the difficulty of obtaining all the information necessary to guide this Government in the decision.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

HON. CHARLES BAGOT.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Monroe.

WASHINGTON, December 31, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of yesterday's date, acquainting me that neither of the propositions which I had submitted to your consideration, upon the subject of providing for the citizens of the United States engaged in the fisheries some adequate accommodation for their pursuit upon the coast of His Majesty's territories, having been found to afford the essential conveniences which are desired, you are compelled to decline them.

The object of His Majesty's Government, in framing these propositions, was to endeavor to assign to the American fishermen, in the prosecution of their employment, as large a participation of the conveniences afforded by the neighboring coasts of His Majesty's settlements as might be reconcilable with the just rights and interests of His Majesty's own subjects, and the due administration of His Majesty's dominions; and it was earnestly hoped that either one or the other of them would have been found to afford, in a sufficient degree, the accommodation which was required.

The wish of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to extend to the citizens of the United States every advantage which, for the purposes in view, can be derived from the use of His Majesty's coasts, has no other limit than that which is necessarily prescribed by a regard to the important considerations to which I have adverted. His Royal Highness is willing to make the utmost concession which these considerations will admit; and, in proof of the sincerity of this disposition, I have received His Royal Highness's instructions to acquaint you that if, upon examination of the local circumstances of the coasts, which I have had the honor to propose, the American Government should be of opinion that neither of them, taken separately, would afford, in a satisfactory degree, the conveniences which are deemed requisite, His Royal Highness will be willing that the citizens of the United States should have the full benefit of both of them, and that, under the conditions already stated, they should be admitted to each of the shores which I have had the honor to point out.

In consenting to assign to their use so large a portion of His Majesty's coasts, His Royal Highness is persuaded that he affords an unquestionable testimony of his earnest endeavor to meet, as far as possible, the wishes of the American Government, and practically to accomplish, in the amplest manner, the objects which they have in view. The free access to each of these tracts cannot fail to offer every variety of convenience which the American fishermen can require in the different branches of their occupation; and it will be observed, that an objection which might possibly have been felt to the acceptance of either of the propositions, when separately taken, is wholly removed by the offer of them conjointly; as, from whatever quarter the wind may blow, the American vessels engaged in the fishery will always have the advantage of a safe port under their lee.

His Royal Highness conceives that it is not in His Royal Highness's power to make a larger concession than that which is now proposed, without injury to the essential rights of His Majesty's dominions, and some of the chief interests of His Majesty's own subjects. But it will be a source of sincere satisfaction to His Royal Highness if, in the arrangement which I have the honor to submit, the citizens of the United States shall find, as His Royal Highness confidently believes that they will find, ample means of continuing to pursue their occupation with the convenience and advantage which they desire.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES BAGOT.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Bagot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 7, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 31st of December, proposing an accommodation of the difference between our Governments relative to the fisheries, comprised in the first branch of the fourth article of the treaty of 1783, by the allotment of both the coasts comprised in your former propositions.

Having stated, in my letter of the 30th of December, that, according to the best information which I had been able to obtain, neither of those coasts had been much frequented by our fishermen, or was likely to be so in future, I am led to believe that they would not, when taken conjointly, as proposed in your last letter, afford the accommodation which is so important to them, and which it is very satisfactory to find it is the desire of your Government that they should possess. From the disposition manifested by your Government, which corresponds with that of the United States, a strong hope is entertained that further inquiry into the subject will enable His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to ascertain that an arrangement, on a scale more accommodating to the expectation of the United States, will not be inconsistent with the interest of Great Britain.

In the meantime, this Government will persevere in its measures for obtaining such further information as will enable it to meet yours in the conciliatory views which are cherished on both sides. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

HON. CHARLES BAGOT.

LONDON, March 20, 1817.

SIR: The day before yesterday I had an interview with Lord Castlereagh, when he informed me that the British Government had come to a determination respecting the commercial part of the proposals for the negotiation of a further treaty, which I had made last September; that they were still not prepared to abandon their ancient colonial system, but they were willing to extend to the United States the benefits of the free port act to the same extent that they were now enjoyed by the vessels of European nations, and to give a partial admission of our vessels to the island of Bermuda and to Turk's Island. And, with regard to the intercourse between the United States and the adjoining British provinces, they would renew a proposal heretofore made, founded altogether upon the principle of reciprocity; which proposal he read to me from a paper which he said was not quite finished, but which would be sent to me in the course of the next day. Last evening I received a note from Mr. Hamilton, the Under Secretary of State in the Foreign Department, with a draught of four articles, a copy of which, hastily made, I now enclose, as Mr. Everett leaves town this morning. The part read to me by Lord Castlereagh was the fourth article, excepting the last paragraph.

I do not think it possible to make anything out of these articles to which I can, under my present instructions, agree. I therefore enclose copies of them, with the request of immediate further instructions. Lord Castlereagh informed me that they had received information that the act of Congress prohibiting the clearance of foreign vessels for ports to which vessels of the United States are not admitted had passed; and he repeated the assurance that this Government considered it as perfectly proper, and as giving them no cause of complaint or dissatisfaction. It seems to me, however, that the very slight and partial concessions in the enclosed articles are intended to counteract its effects; and this opinion contributes to caution me against subscribing to them without your further orders. Lord Castlereagh's offer is to make them supplementary to the convention of July 3, 1815, and to be in force for the same time.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ART. 1. His Britannic Majesty consents to extend to the United States the provisions of the free port act, as established by the 45th George III, c. 57, (except as far as relates to negro slaves, which, under the abolition acts, can no longer be lawfully exported from any British possessions to any foreign country;) that is to say, that any sloop, schooner, or other vessel whatever, not having more than one deck, and being owned and navigated by subjects of the United States, may import into any of the free ports in His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, from the United States, any of the articles enumerated in the above act, being of the growth or production of the United States, and any coin, bullion, diamonds, and precious stones; and the said articles being of the growth or production of the United States, and also all other articles imported into the said free ports, by virtue of this convention, from the United States, shall be subject, in all respects, to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, and shall enjoy the same advantages as to re-exportation, as are now applied to similar articles when imported by authority of the said act from any other foreign country, and re-exported from the said possessions of His Majesty. His Britannic Majesty further consents, that any vessel of the United States, as above described, may export from any of the said ports to the United States, rum, of the produce of any British colony or possession, and also all manner of goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been legally imported into those possessions of His Majesty in which the said free ports are established, except masts, yards, or bowsprits, pitch, tar, and turpentine, and also except such iron as shall have been brought from the British colonies or plantations in America.

And whereas, by an act passed in the 48th year of His Majesty's reign, cap. 125, rice, grain, and flour, are added to the articles previously allowed to be imported into the said free ports, it is agreed that those articles may be imported from the United States into the said free ports, in vessels of the United States, as above described; and it is agreed, on the part of the United States, that any facilities granted in consequence of this convention to American vessels, in His Majesty's said colonies and possessions, shall be reciprocally granted, in the ports of the United States, to British vessels of a similar description engaged in the intercourse so allowed to be carried on; and that if, at any future period, during the continuance of this convention, His Britannic Majesty should think fit to grant any further facilities to vessels of the United States in the said colonies and possessions, British vessels trading between the said colonies and possessions and the United States shall enjoy in the ports of the latter equal and reciprocal advantages.

It is further agreed, that articles imported into the said free ports of the United States, by virtue of this convention, shall pay the same duties as are or may be payable upon similar articles when imported into the said free ports from any foreign country. And the same rule shall be observed on the part of the United States, in regard to all duties chargeable upon all such articles as may, by virtue of this convention, be exported from the said free ports to the United States. But His Britannic Majesty reserves to himself the right to impose higher duties upon all articles so allowed to be imported into the said free ports from the United States, or from any other foreign country, than are or may be chargeable upon all similar articles when imported from any of His Majesty's possessions.

ART. 2. His Britannic Majesty engages to allow the vessels of the United States to import into the island of Bermuda the following articles, to wit: tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, staves, heading boards, and plank, timber, shingles, and lumber of any sort; bread, biscuit, flour, peas, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, and grain of any sort; such commodities being the growth or production of the territories belonging to the United States of America; and to export from the said island to the United States, in vessels of the said States, any goods or commodities whatsoever, which are now by law allowed to be exported from His Majesty's colonies and possessions in the West Indies to any foreign country or place in Europe; and also sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoanuts, ginger, and pimento; and also all goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, upon the same terms, and subject to the same duties only as would affect similar articles when imported from the United States into Bermuda, or exported from Bermuda to the United States, in British ships. And it is agreed, on the part of the United States, that a similar equality shall prevail, in the ports of the said States, with regard to all British vessels trading in similar articles between the United States and the island of Bermuda.

ART. 3. It is agreed that vessels of the United States may resort to Turk's Island for the purpose of taking in cargoes of salt for the United States; and that the vessels so resorting to the said islands shall be allowed to import tobacco and cotton wool, the produce of the said United States, upon the same terms, and subject to the same duties, as British ships when engaged in a similar intercourse. It is agreed, on the part of the United States, that a similar equality shall prevail in the ports of the said States, with regard to all British vessels trading in the same articles between the United States and the said Turk's Island.

ART. 4. It is agreed that the navigation of all lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is, or may be, the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories on the continent of North America and the United States, shall, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, at all times be free to His Majesty's vessels and those of the citizens of the United States. The inhabitants of His Britannic Majesty's territories in North America, and the citizens and subjects of the United States, may freely carry on trade and commerce, by land or inland navigation, as aforesaid, in goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the British territories in Europe or elsewhere, or of the United States, respectively, on the said continent, (the countries within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted;) and no other or higher duties, or tolls, or rates of carriage or portage, than which are, or shall be, payable by natives, respectively, shall be taken or demanded on either side. All goods or merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of commerce above mentioned, be carried into the said United States, in the manner aforesaid, by His Britannic Majesty's subjects; and such goods or merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States; and, in like manner, all goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, whose importation into His Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same by land, or by means of such lakes, rivers, and water communications, as above mentioned, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duties than would be payable by His Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories.

No duty shall be levied, by either party, on peltries or furs which may be brought, in the manner aforesaid, by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of another; but tolls or rates of ferrage may be demanded and taken, in manner above mentioned, on such peltries or furs.

It is further agreed that nothing in this article contained, as to the navigation of rivers, lakes, or water communications, shall extend to give a right of navigation upon or within the same, in those ports where the middle is not the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories and the United States of America.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh, dated 13 CRAVEN STREET, April 21, 1817.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, has received the four projected articles for a supplement to the commercial convention of 13d July, 1815, sent him by direction of Lord Castlereagh, and has transmitted them for the consideration of his Government.

By a letter of instruction from the Secretary of State of the United States of the 5th February last, the undersigned is informed that the negotiation between him and Mr. Bagot, in relation to the fisheries on the North American coast, had not been brought to the desired result; that it is yet to be hoped, however, that it may be satisfactorily settled; that, with this view, it was the President's intention to renew the negotiation as soon as he could obtain the information necessary to ascertain what arrangement would be best calculated to reconcile the interests of both parties, which he hoped to do in the course of a few months; that, in the meantime, he relied that no measures would be taken by His Majesty's Government to alter the existing state of things; and, particularly, that the order to the naval officer commanding on that station, not to interrupt or disturb the American fishermen during the approaching season, would be renewed.

The undersigned has the honor of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Adams, dated FOREIGN OFFICE, May 7, 1817.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reply to Mr. Adams's note of the 21st ultimo, has the honor to acquaint him that, as soon as the proposition which Mr. Bagot was authorized, in July last, to make to the Government of the United States, for arranging the manner in which American citizens might be permitted to carry on the fisheries within the British limits, had been by them declined, viz: in the month of February, the same was immediately notified by His Majesty's Minister in America to the British Admiral commanding at Halifax;

the effect of which notification was to revive the orders which Mr. Bagot had taken upon himself to suspend, in the expectation that the discussions in which he was then employed with the American Government would have led to a satisfactory issue.

These discussions having failed of success, and the orders above alluded to being consequently now in full force, the British Government cannot but feel some reluctance again to suspend them, without being in possession of more precise grounds for expecting an adjustment. Persuaded, however, from the official communication received from Mr. Adams, that it is not only the sincere desire of the President of the United States to come to an amicable arrangement, but also that he, being already in possession of the views of Great Britain, is now led to entertain a strong expectation that a settlement which shall reconcile the interests of both parties may, without any material delay, be effectuated, the Prince Regent, under these impressions, is willing to give to the American Government this additional proof of his earnest wish that the negotiation should proceed, under circumstances the most favorable to a speedy and amicable conclusion, by acceding to the application of the Government of the United States, as brought forward by Mr. Adams. Instructions will accordingly be expedited to the naval commanders on the American station to suspend the execution of the said orders during the approaching season. Ample opportunity will thus be afforded for coming to an amicable arrangement, more particularly as it appears that the American Secretary, in February last, had it in contemplation to offer, for the consideration of the British Government, some specific proposition on the subject, which Mr. Bagot did not then feel himself authorized to take, ad referendum, but which he has since been instructed to receive, and transmit for the opinion of his Court.

Mr. Rush, acting as Secretary of State, to Mr. Bagot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 30, 1817.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, and have laid before the President, your note of the 27th of this month.

In answer to it, I have the honor to state that this Government is not yet prepared to make known, in any definite and final shape, the nature and extent of the accommodation desired by its citizens engaged in the fisheries along the coast of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, according to the invitation held out, by order of the Prince Regent, in your note. At the same time, I am directed by the President to inform you that he recognises, in the terms of this invitation, not less than in the general scope of your note, a spirit of friendly accommodation, which this Government, not foregoing rights which it feels itself bound to look to, will, nevertheless, be desirous, in the fullest extent, to reciprocate.

On the return of the President from a tour through part of the United States, which he is now upon the eve of commencing, it is expected that this Department will be enabled to offer such propositions as, taking for their basis the principles stated in your note, it is confidently hoped may end in an adjustment of this important interest, upon terms reconcilable with the views of both nations, and serve to strengthen the harmony and good understanding which it is so desirable to cultivate and preserve between them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

RICHARD RUSH.

The Right Hon. CHARLES BAGOT.

Mr. Rush, Acting Secretary of State, to Mr. Bagot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 4, 1818.

SIR: It becomes my duty to address you upon a subject of deep interest to all those citizens of this country who are concerned in the fisheries.

By representations made to this Department, it appears that, at the commencement of the present fishing season, twenty sail of fishing vessels, of from twenty-five to forty-five tons burden, belonging to ports of the United States, were fitted out and sailed for the purpose of fishing on the western bank. That, while on their way, a number of them were compelled, by storm, to put into a harbor at Ragged Island, near Shelburne light-house. That, while here, they were boarded by an officer of the customs, who demanded and received light-money from them, notwithstanding the circumstances of compulsion and distress under which they had entered the port. That they afterwards proceeded to the bank, where, after remaining many weeks, they completed their fares of fish, and commenced their return to the United States. That, meeting with another severe storm upon their return, they were again forced to seek shelter in a British port, a few leagues to the westward of Halifax. That in this port they were captured by an armed barge, despatched from the British sloop of war Dee, Captain Chambers, and the next morning ordered for Halifax, where they all arrived on the 9th of June. That the unfortunate crews have been exposed to peculiar inconveniences and hardships; and that those who desired to return to their homes were refused passports towards facilitating that end, from the proper officers, to whom they made application.

For further particulars connected with the above facts, I have the honor to enclose you an extract of a letter to this Department from the collector of Boston, dated June the 30th. It will be seen that it is not a case involving unsettled questions between the two countries in relation to the fisheries, but which it is so confidently hoped are in a train of satisfactory and amicable arrangement. It is, on the other hand, distinctly said that the boats, far from taking a fish in any waters claimed as British waters, took them all at the distance of many leagues from the coast; while the other alleged facts would seem to forbid the imputation of their having entered a British harbor from any other than a lawful and necessary motive.

Should the facts as represented prove to be well founded, the President feels persuaded that your Government will not fail to take such measures, as well towards redressing the evil complained of, in the present instance, as towards preventing the recurrence of one of the like nature, as are due to justice and the harmony and good understanding which so happily subsist between the two nations.

I pray you, sir, to accept, &c.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Rush.

WASHINGTON, August 8, 1817.

SIR: I had yesterday the honor to receive your letter of the 4th instant, acquainting me with the representations which had been made to the Department of State in relation to the seizure, by His Majesty's ship Dee, of certain American fishing vessels found in the harbors of Port Negro and Ragged Island, upon the coast of Nova Scotia, and transmitting to me the extract of a letter upon the subject from the collector of the customs at Boston.

Should the circumstances of this seizure, as they have been represented to the American Government, prove to be correct, I can have no hesitation in giving you every assurance that His Majesty's Government will willingly take measures for the prompt redress of the injuries to which it may have led, and for the prevention of their recurrence; but the representations which I have received upon the subject from the Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's squadron on the Halifax station differ so essentially in point of fact from those which have been made to the American Government, that I have every reason to hope that, upon a proper investigation of the transaction, it will not be found to involve any just cause of complaint.

I have the honor to transmit to you, enclosed, the copy of a letter from the captain of His Majesty's ship Dee to the commander of His Majesty's squadron on the coast of Nova Scotia, reporting the grounds upon which he had deemed it to be his duty to detain these vessels, together with a copy of the orders under which he has acted.

By these papers you will perceive that the vessels in question were in the habit of occupying, and were, at the time of their seizure, actually occupying, for the purposes of their fishery, the settled harbors of His Majesty's dominions, in violation of the orders at all times enforced against all foreign vessels detected in making similar encroachments, and of which it is not to be supposed that the masters of these vessels could have been ignorant.

The proceedings which have been instituted upon the captured vessels will necessarily lead to a complete investigation of all the circumstances under which they were detained; and there can be no doubt that the merits of the whole case, which appear to rest altogether upon questions of fact, will be then fully ascertained.

I have the honor to be, &c.

By Sir DAVID MILNE, K. C. B. and K. W. N.,
Rear Admiral of the Blue, and Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, in North America, and on the lakes of Canada, &c., &c.

You are hereby required and directed to proceed, in His Majesty's ship under your command, to Halifax; and, having received on board a pilot at that port, you will repair and cruise between Sambro light-house and Cape Sable, using every means in your power for the protection of the revenue, as also the fisheries on that coast, against the encroachment of foreigners.

On your meeting with any foreign vessel fishing or at anchor in any of the harbors or creeks in his Majesty's North American provinces, or within our maritime jurisdiction, you will seize and send such vessel so trespassing to Halifax for adjudication, unless it should clearly appear that they have been obliged to put in there in consequence of distress; acquainting me with the cause of such seizure, and every other particular, to enable me to give all information to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

You are to come within sight of signals from Sambro light-house every fourteen days, if the wind and weather will permit, and wait eight hours at that distance. You will continue on this service for six weeks from your sailing from Halifax, at the expiration of which time you will return to that port for further orders.

Given, on board His Majesty's ship Leander, Bermuda, the 12th day of May, 1817.

DAVID MILNE, Rear Admiral.

To Captain SAMUEL CHAMBERS, of His Majesty's ship Dee.

By command of the Rear Admiral:
J. P. LAMEY.

Captain Samuel Chambers, of His Britannic Majesty's ship Dee, to Rear Admiral Sir David Milne, dated

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP DEE,
OFF SHELBURNE, June 8, 1817.

SIR: In compliance with your order of the 12th ultimo, I sailed from Halifax on the 30th ultimo; but did not meet or receive any intelligence of foreign fishing vessels being within our jurisdiction until the 3d instant; when, being off the Isle of Maten, I was informed that the whole of the banks to the westward (off Cape Sable and Shelburne) were fished by American schooners; and that they continually resorted to the creeks of this coast in order to catch their bait, clean their fish, wood, water, &c.; this, of course, is highly detrimental to the interest of the industrious fishermen on this coast. I was also informed that the intricate harbors of Cape Negro and Ragged Island were their resort most evenings, several going in; but more particularly on Saturdays, when they remain till Monday, to procure bait for the ensuing week. At the former place they had not been well received; at the latter, I suspect, much encouragement had been given them by an individual. I intended having our boats into Ragged Island harbor before daylight on the 4th, but light winds prevented our getting that length. I, therefore, in the course of the day, put into Shelburne; and, in the evening, despatched the boats, under the charge of Lieutenant Hooper, into Ragged Island, with the order I enclose; the weather preventing any boats returning until the 7th, when I received information that nine American fishing vessels had been found at Ragged Island harbor, lying with their nets set. Lieutenant Hooper remained at this place, and despatched Lieutenant Lechere, with a gig and cutter, to Cape Negro, with the enclosed order. He found two American fishing vessels in the harbor, and seven others came in in the course of Saturday. The whole joined me this day with two others that came into Ragged Island. I have, therefore, in obedience to your directions, sent them into Halifax for adjudication; as any distress they may plead might, with more ease, be relieved at the regular harbor of Shelburne, which has been avoided for two intricate harbors in its immediate neighborhood.

I beg further to state that, without the use of our harbors, it appears impossible for any foreigners to carry on successful fishing on this coast, which fishing has much injured our fishermen; and I have every reason to believe that considerable smuggling of tobacco, shoes, &c., is carried on by their boats. I beg leave to enclose a list of the detained vessels, and also to inform you that, from some of the Americans attempting to tamper with some of our boats' crews, and the riotous conduct of others, I have been obliged to take precautionary measures to prevent any of the vessels being run away with.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SAM'L CHAMBERS, Captain.

Sir DAVID MILNE, K. C. B.,
Commander-in-chief, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rush, Envoy, &c. at London, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Nov. 6, 1817.

A full power to conclude a commercial treaty is furnished you, together with your commission and credential letters; and in your earliest communications with the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, you will give him notice that you have such a power. Should he, then or at any subsequent time, while the United States are at peace, manifest, on the part of his Government, a disposition to enter upon the negotiation, and be provided with similar powers, you will recur to the instructions given to the American Plenipotentiaries for the negotiation of the peace. In them all the views of this Government, in relation to the proper regulation of maritime neutrality, are developed at large; and the President, still convinced that the principles there recommended are the best adapted to promote the great and permanent welfare of all mankind, and the preservation of peace upon earth, is yet willing that the United States should be bound by them, when their occasional and temporary operation may be to their disadvantage, provided they can secure the benefit of them when they shall hereafter be under circumstances to operate in their favor.

With regard to the strictly commercial part of the treaty, the principles for regulating the trade between the two countries during peace, you will recur to the same instructions to the Plenipotentiaries for the peace, to the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815, and to the instructions given to your predecessor in reference to the negotiation of a commercial treaty, particularly with regard to the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies and upon this continent.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 21, 1818.

The other law to which I have called your attention is an act concerning navigation, passed on the 18th, and published in the National Intelligencer of the 21st April. It meets the British prohibitive colonial system by direct and countervailing prohibition, to commence from and after the 30th of September next. The vote upon its passage in the Senate, where it originated, was all but unanimous, and in the House of Representatives the opposition to it amounted only to fifteen or sixteen votes.

Although no formal communication of this law to the British Government will be necessary, it may naturally be expected that it will be noticed in your occasional conversations with Lord Castlereagh. He will doubtless remember, and may be reminded of, the repeated efforts made by this Government to render it unnecessary by an amicable arrangement, which should place on an equitable footing of reciprocity the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies; he will remember the repeated warnings given, that to this result it must come, unless some relaxation of the British prohibitions should take place; and his own equally repeated admissions, that the exercise of the prohibitive right on the part of the United States would be altogether just, and would give no dissatisfaction whatever to Great Britain. You are, nevertheless, authorized to assure him that the President assented to this measure with great reluctance, because, however just in itself it may be, its tendencies cannot but be of an irritating character to the interests which it will immediately affect, and because his earnest desire is to remove causes of irritation, and to multiply those of a conciliatory nature between the two countries. Such has manifestly been, on both sides, the effect of the equalizing and reciprocal provisions of the convention of July, 1815; and such, he has no doubt, would be the effect of the extension of its principles to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies and on this continent; and you are authorized again to repeat the offer of treating for a fair and equitable arrangement of this interest. A further inducement for making this offer may be stated in the expediency of looking forward, without further delay, to the expiration of the convention of 1815, which has now little more than one year to remain in force. It is important that the commercial part of the community, both here and in Great Britain, should have timely notice of the state in which the relations between the two countries are to stand after the termination of that convention. And, as there are other objects of moment to be adjusted, the President desires you to propose an immediate general negotiation of a commercial treaty, to embrace the continuance, for a further term of years, of the convention; and also the other subjects in discussion between the two Governments—namely, the question concerning the slaves, that relating to the fisheries, the boundary line from the Lake of the Woods, and the Columbia river settlement. The President prefers taking this course to that of submitting to commissioners, at least immediately, questions upon which he thinks it probable the two Governments may thus, by a shorter process, come to a mutual understanding between themselves.

If, upon making this proposal, the British Government agree to this negotiation, the President proposes that Mr. Gallatin and you should be authorized, jointly, as plenipotentiaries, to conclude the treaty, which it is very desirable may be concluded in season to arrive here by the commencement of the next session of Congress, which is to be on the third Monday in November. Instructions will be transmitted immediately to Mr. Gallatin to hold himself in readiness to repair to London, upon receiving notice from you, should plenipotentiaries be appointed to treat with you; and, besides the instructions which formed the basis of the existing convention, and others already in your possession, further documents will be forwarded to you as soon as possible, which may assist you in the management of the negotiation.

We entertain hopes that this measure may result in a new treaty, which will remove most, if not all, of the causes of dissension between us and Great Britain. The satisfaction with which we have observed the avowal of the most liberal commercial principles by Lord Castlereagh in Parliament has already been noticed in my last letter. The opening, if not of all, at least of a great portion, of the ports of South America to the commerce of the world, which, under every possible course of events, must be now considered as irrevocable; and the bill which we perceive was before Parliament for establishing free ports in the British American colonies, all tend to convince us that Great Britain must see that a relaxation from her colonial restrictions has become the unequivocal dictate of her own interest.

J. Q. ADAMS.

Hon. RICHARD RUSH.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Gallatin, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 22, 1818.

The present state of the relations between the United States and Great Britain has suggested to the President the expediency of proposing to the British Government the negotiation of a treaty of amity and commerce, to embrace the continuance for eight years longer of the commercial convention of July 3, 1815, and to attempt the adjustment of other objects interesting to the two countries, and upon which the Governments have not yet been able to come to an agreement. It is desirable that this negotiation should take place in the course of the ensuing Summer, and that its result should be transmitted here for the commencement of the next session of Congress, fixed for the third Monday of November. For, as the convention, unless continued, will expire in July, 1819, and as it is due to the interests of the merchants on both sides affected by it that early notice should be given whether its provisions are to be continued or to cease, it appears that no time is to be lost in bringing the question of its renewal or cessation to an immediate issue. As the motives for taking up the subject thus early are operative alike upon both parties, and as, in the event of the expiration of the convention of July, 1815, legislative measures preparatory to that contingency will doubtless be necessary as well in Parliament as in Congress, it is expected that this proposal will be acceded to by the British Government, and that Plenipotentiaries on their part will be appointed to treat with you and Mr. Rush, to whom jointly the President proposes to commit the trust of this negotiation.

A copy of the instructions forwarded to Mr. Rush relating to this subject is herewith enclosed; and the President desires that you would hold yourself, accordingly, ready to repair to London immediately upon receiving the notice from Mr. Rush that the British Government agree to the proposal, and have appointed, or are ready to appoint, Plenipotentiaries to confer and conclude with you. Your long experience and great knowledge of the subjects to be treated on are the motives of the President for associating you in this commission. A full power for the negotiation is herewith enclosed, and further instructions and documents relating to it will be transmitted to Mr. Rush as soon as they can be prepared. Your necessary and reasonable expenses upon this special mission will be allowed in like manner with those of a similar mission upon which you were employed last Summer in the Netherlands.

The President is willing that the convention of July 3, 1815, should be continued for eight or even ten years as it stands. Its operation has indeed been in some respects disadvantageous to the United States, and favorable to Great Britain, owing to the revival of the interdiction of access to our vessels to the British West India and North American colonies, while our intercourse with them has been exclusively confined to British vessels. Yet that the injury to our navigation and shipping interest has not been very essential, we have many indications.

The moral effect of the equalization of duties on both sides in softening national asperities has been unequivocal, and is an object of much importance, deserving to be cherished and improved by both Governments. The encouragement which the convention has given to our trade with the British possessions in the East Indies is more questionable, as that trade operates upon us as a continual and embarrassing drain of specie. But as it has been a trade of profitable returns, and as it would still to a great extent be carried on with the native States of India, if we should be excluded, or our intercourse should be burdened and restricted with the British territories, the President will be satisfied to leave it as it is, and subject to the increasing competition of the British private traders with India, which will be likely to affect the interests of the British company more than ours.

The other interests which the President hopes may be adjusted by this negotiation are—

1. The intercourse with the British colonies in the West Indies and North America. You are well acquainted with the failure of the attempt to extend the convention of 1815 to this intercourse at the negotiation of the convention, and at a subsequent period, when four additional articles were proposed on the part of Great Britain, a copy of which you have. There was reason to believe that Lord Castlereagh was personally well disposed to a more liberal expansion of the colonial intercourse, although the Cabinet was not entirely prepared for it. The manner in which he has recently avowed a liberal commercial principle in Parliament, and the approbation with which that avowal was received; the obvious, though not declared, bearing which those sentiments had both upon the South American contest and upon the relations between the United States and the British colonies; the free port acts which we understand have been introduced into Parliament, and are even said to have passed, strongly and concurrently indicate that a change has taken place in the policy of the Cabinet on this subject; and we hope that now is precisely the favorable time for taking advantage of it. Our own navigation act may, perhaps, contribute to the same effect; and even should it operate otherwise, and confirm them in their obstinate exclusion of our vessels from those ports, as it will make their exclusion from ours to the same extent reciprocal, it leaves us the more free to agree to the renewal of the convention of July, 1815, if nothing more can be obtained.

2. Indemnity to the owners of the slaves carried away from the United States by British officers, after the ratification of the peace of Ghent, and contrary to a stipulation in the first article of that treaty.

Copies of the correspondence between the two Governments, on this subject, are in the possession of Mr. Rush. They disagreed in their construction of the stipulation alluded to; and, each party adhering to its own view of it, a proposal was made, nearly two years since, on our part, to refer it to the arbitration of some friendly sovereign. This proposal, which Mr. Rush, upon his arrival in England, renewed, has now been accepted by the British Government; but with a further proposal to refer it, and two other subjects, for arrangement in the first instance, to commissions like those under the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent.

3. 4. These other subjects are, the boundary line from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods westward, which you remember was all but agreed upon, and went off upon a collateral incident at Ghent; and our title to the settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river.

The expediency of referring any of these questions to two commissioners, one belonging to each of the two countries, is very doubtful. With regard to the slaves, and to Columbia river, it can scarcely be expected that the commissioner of either party would ultimately entertain an opinion different from that already pronounced by his own Government; and, if concession upon one point is to be made the condition of corresponding concession upon the other, it may with more propriety be effected by compromise between the two Governments, than by judiciary powers given by them to individuals, under allegiance to the two countries themselves. As to the line from the Lake of the Woods, as some dissatisfaction has already been excited here by the expense occasioned by the two commissions already employed in settling the boundary, another commission, to draw a line through the depth of the deserts, and to an indefinite extent, would be still more liable to censure; besides the apprehension which it might raise, that the issue of the commission would be to bring the British territory again in contact with the Mississippi.

5. The fisheries.

The correspondence between the two Governments on this subject leaves it still in the unsettled state in which it was left at the peace. Two proposals have been made on the part of the British Government, neither of which proving acceptable, a counter-proposal from us has been promised, and will be contained in the further detailed instructions which will be prepared and forwarded to Mr. Rush, to assist in the conduct of the negotiation.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States:
To all whom these presents shall concern—
Greeting:

Know ye, that, for the purpose of perpetuating between the United States and his Britannic Majesty the harmony and good correspondence happily subsisting between them, and of removing all grounds of dissatisfaction, and reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and abilities, of Albert Gallatin, our

15th CON. 2d SESS.—48

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of France; and of Richard Rush, our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; I have invested them with full and all manner of power and authority, for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with any person or persons authorized by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and behalf of His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being furnished with like power and authority; and with him or them to agree, treat, consult, and negotiate, of and concerning the renewal of the convention concluded at London on the 3d of July, 1815, and concerning the general commerce between the United States and Great Britain and its dominions or dependencies, and such other matters and subjects interesting to the two nations as may be given to them in charge; and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, touching the premises; transmitting the same to the President of the United States for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the 22d day of May, A. D. 1818, and of the independence of the United States the forty-second.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 30, 1818.

It is not our desire to embarrass the proposed commercial negotiation with any of the questions of maritime regulations adapted to a state of warfare. We do not wish that blockade, contraband trade with enemies or their colonies, or even impressment, should be drawn into the discussion, unless such a wish should be manifested on the British side.

Mr. Bagot has been informed that this negotiation will be proposed, and that, in the event of its being agreed to, another Plenipotentiary will be joined with you, to confer and conclude with those who may be appointed on the part of Great Britain. He is not aware that there will be any objection to it; but, if there should be any, and the British Government should determine to keep the renewal of the commercial convention distinct from every other subject to be arranged between the two countries, you will, of course, not give the notice to Mr. Gallatin to repair to London, mentioned in my last despatch. If the British Cabinet agree to negotiate, it is hoped that the special instructions to be prepared and forwarded to you will reach you as soon as Mr. Gallatin will find it convenient to meet you in London. If the British Cabinet prefer, by a single article, to renew the convention of July, 1815, for a term of eight, ten, or even twelve years, or any shorter period, your full power, heretofore given, will be still in force, and will enable you to conclude such an article, subject to the ratification here, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

LONDON, June 26, 1818.

In my interview with Lord Castlereagh on the 11th of this month, other subjects were treated than those I have already communicated, of which it is proper that I should now give a particular account.

In the foremost rank stands impressment. A sufficient interval having elapsed, I asked his Lordship if any answer was made up on the proposal I had submitted on the 18th of April. He replied that he had brought it before the Cabinet, where it had been considered with all the care which it merited. He proceeded to touch upon some of the principles and arguments to which the subject always leads. He adverted first, as connected with naturalization, to the opposite opinion which the two Governments held upon the doctrine of allegiance. I said that I was aware of no opinions entertained by the Government of the United States upon that point, except such as were sanctioned by the ancient and predominant authorities of law, as well as the general usage of Europe. He next observed that we gave to our ships a character of sovereignty which Great Britain did not; that we considered them part of our territory, clothing them with corresponding immunities. I said it was true that we did consider our ships quite as inviolable as the soil, in the protection which they should afford to our seamen, whether native or naturalized; but never had we, as a neutral, claimed to shield them from entry under any of the just belligerent rights of search; that is, whether to look for persons in the land or naval service of a co-belligerent, articles contraband of war, or enemy's property. That these constituted the utmost limit to which the belligerent claim had ever been pushed. What we complained of was, that Great Britain, passing them all, should enter a new field, and set up a right to enforce in our vessels, while navigating the high seas, her own municipal laws. His Lordship did not view it in this light, but spoke of the claim as one being established and incontestable on the part of Great Britain. He said it became his duty to add, that, on a full consideration of the proposal, it had not been found practicable to forego, under any conventional agreement, the execution of which was to depend upon the legislative ordinances of another country, this right of looking for her subjects upon the ocean wherever she might be likely to find them.

From the broad ground of this decision, it became evident that there could no longer be any possible advantage in adhering to the course marked down in my despatch of the 20th of April. This, it will be recollected, was not to disclose, in the first instance, all my powers. I therefore risked nothing in asking his Lordship what difference it would make if the United States would agree to exclude from service, on board both of their ships of war and merchant vessels, all native born British subjects.

He replied that this, indeed, would be going a step further, but it would still leave the proposal within the principle of their objection. That the objection, in short, went to the full length of an unwillingness to concede, by treaty, the right of entering the vessels of a foreign Power, to look for their subjects, whatever its terms.

I now remarked that I heard this determination with regret, as I was ready to accede to a stipulation, on the part of my Government, bottomed on the unqualified exclusion of all natives from both branches of the service; and I feared, also, that this would exhaust all the offers which it had to submit. I begged that he would, in fact, consider such an offer as distinctly made, and under full authority. He promised to do so.

Every proposal which it fell within the compass of the United States to put forward being gone through, I asked in turn, if it had occurred to his Lordship to hold out any overtures on the part of the British Government. I reiterated, in forcible terms, the assurance that there prevailed throughout the United States one universal wish, with Government and people, to see removed the sources of a dispute which concerned so seriously both nations. But I found that he was prepared with none which did not assume the right of previously entering our ships. For the judicious and safe exercise of this right, Great Britain, he said, was willing to enter into the most effective regulations, such as restricting the boarding officers to those of a rank not below lieutenants, giving responsible receipts for the men taken out, or any other safeguards which the American Government might propose as better adapted to the end; that she would always be ready to receive, and in the most friendly manner discuss, proposals of this description, under the hope of some practicable arrangement growing out of them.

I did not hesitate to say that the United States would never admit, by convention, a right to enter their vessels for such a purpose as impressment. It would be to surrender principles which they held too sacred; besides, that its exercise, however attempted to be softened, must necessarily be liable, from circumstances intrinsic and insurmountable between the two nations, to perpetual and the most fatal abuse. His Lordship, while repeating the inability of Great Britain to abandon by compact her ancient right, again frankly admitted the evils of which it had been the parent, and which he hoped never to see revived. He added that it would be her anxious desire in future, hoping that the day of necessity for its actual exercise was far distant, to free it as much as possible from abuse, and that, in particular, it would be much the more sparingly brought into activity, if the American Government, by adopting, of its own accord, such legislative ordinances as I had proposed, would thus inspire a confidence that, at all events, but few of her subjects would find their way into American ships.

It will be supposed that I alluded to the unequal ground upon which such a course would place the United States. If they consented to pass laws of this nature, it might reasonably be expected that they must see their way to an equivalent in some stipulation, on the part of Great Britain, of ascertained and positive value, and that no other would be stamped with that character but an agreement not to enter their ships.

Although I explicitly made the proposal of a willingness not to employ in our service even her native subjects, I did not think it right that it should rest upon the footing of a verbal offer. The less did I think this would be prudent, from observing an inclination in his Lordship's mind, towards the close of our conversation, to consider what had passed as wearing an informal rather than any other character, inasmuch as it had been productive of no results. I removed this impression by new and unequivocal declarations that it was to be regarded differently. In conformity with them, I put into his hands, on the 20th of this month, the paper marked No. 2, which accompanies this despatch. In delivering it, I desired that he would consider it as altogether and strictly official. It was true, I said, the proposal which it embraced had already been rejected; but I knew so well the anxiety of the President upon this great point, as to feel sure that I should be more truly the organ of his will by putting it in a shape in which it might go among the archives of this Government, and would add, in the further hope that possibly other views might, in other times, be taken of it. On receiving the paper with this remark, his Lordship said he would lay it before the Cabinet on his return from Ireland, whither he was soon to go, and that, perhaps, it might be thought advisable to put in writing the objections and counter-opinions of Great Britain.

In this abortive manner has the attempt ended. I have endeavored to recount, with all possible accuracy, what has transpired, and trust that in no material point have I misunderstood the communications of this Government. It places upon record another and an earnest effort to settle this great and formidable controversy. The failure is the more to be deplored, as the attempt has been made during a season of profound peace, and when the two Governments seem well disposed towards each other. The United States have again done all that they could towards allaying it. They declare that they want not British seamen in their vessels. They engage to exclude them by all the means that human laws can devise. In a spirit of extreme conciliation, they go farther in their offer than the obligations of co-equal sovereignty, or the policy and habits of their internal system, might, in the judgment of all, be thought to dictate. Whilst they concede so much, Britain will yield nothing. She remains rigid and inexorable. She will not meet half way. She will not turn a step from her course. To an alleged right, but which has often been demonstrated to be utterly without support, in any one principle that the society of nations has ever recognised—unless the dicta of English common lawyers make up the great and universal code of public law—does she continue to cling, in the mere ambitious and wilful reliance upon an unchecked career in her naval supremacy. It is upon such foundations that she virtually threatens the indefinite continuance of a practice more afflicting to humanity, as far as the scale extends, than was ever the African slave trade, and in the highest degree insulting to the rights and dignity of an independent and powerful nation.

The subject of impressment being, I fear, finally disposed of, as one of negotiation between the two Governments, Lord Castlereagh next reminded me that it was now but little more than a twelvemonth from the time fixed for the expiration of the commercial convention of 1815. He asked if I knew the views of my Government in regard to its renewal. I replied that at present I did not, with precision. He requested that I would consider his question as intended to draw my attention specially to the subject, and expressed some anxiety to have information at as early a day as convenient.

I anticipate the probability of the expression of some sentiments to me from the Department, in the course of the present Summer, in relation to this convention. How far our act, bearing upon their colonies, is to operate on the question of renewal, or, if objectionable in its existing provisions, in what respects modifications are to be insisted upon, are points on which I am not instructed. I am aware that it is already made my duty to obtain and transmit information upon which, perhaps, a final opinion on the merits of the convention was expected, in part, to rest. Of this duty I have not been unmindful. But it is proper I should state that my efforts, for reasons that will be explained in a future despatch, do not promise as much success as I had hoped. Besides inquiries among individual merchants, wherever it has come within my power to make them, I addressed, in March, a letter to each one of our Consuls within the European dominions of this country. Answers are, from time to time, dropping in; but neither from them, and still less from my personal inquiries, is it likely that I shall derive information, either so full or so accurate, on the effects of the cessation of all discriminating duties, as to be of any decisive or even great account in making up a judgment. In the next place, although I will take care that what I do obtain is transmitted in time for the session of Congress in November, the period which my instructions seem to contemplate, it would be desirable, I am sure, to this Government, to be furnished sooner, if possible, with an intimation of the intentions of ours in relation to this compact.

If it is to be suffered to run out without renewal, Great Britain having positively declined forming a treaty with us which shall include her colonies, upon what footing are the commercial relations of the two countries to stand? Will each be left to its own regulations, as sometimes heretofore, or is any substitute to be proposed? These are points on which I should feel happy to receive information, whenever it may be thought fit to impart it.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, stating a conversation between himself and Lord Castlereagh, dated LONDON, July 25, 1818.

I entered next upon the subject of the commercial relations between the two countries. Remark upon the change produced in them by the prohibitory act of the last session of Congress, now soon to commence its operation, I observed that I had it in charge to say that the President had yielded his assent to that act with reluctance; for that, however just, its tendencies might be of an irritating nature to the individual interests that it would affect on both sides, whilst it was his constant desire to give efficacy to measures mutually more beneficial and conciliatory. It was, therefore, that I was once more authorized and instructed to propose to this Government the negotiation of a general treaty of commerce. That the President had, besides, agreed that there should be comprehended in the negotiation other matters heretofore desired to be treated of by this Government, as well as points in which the Government of the United States took a particular interest; being, in the whole, 1. The question respecting the slaves carried off from the United States, in contravention, as alleged, of the Treaty of Ghent. 2. The question of title to the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river. 3. The question of the Northwestern boundary line, from the Lake of the Woods; and 4. That of the fisheries. Upon these topics, the President, I added, preferred treating in a direct way in the first instance, in the hope that the two Governments might arrive at a just understanding, without resorting to commissioners; and that, if this Government was prepared to go into all of them, including, especially, a general treaty of commerce, another Plenipotentiary had been contingently appointed on the part of the United States, to meet with me any two that might be designated on the part of Great Britain.

His Lordship asked what he was to understand by a general treaty of commerce. I replied, a treaty that should lay open, not a temporary or precarious, but a permanent intercourse with their West India islands and North American colonies to the shipping of the United States, as often before proposed, but which, after the recent refusals, it might seem almost unnecessary again to bring into view, were it not that other objects of interest to both nations were now associated with it in a way to clothe the proposition with a new aspect.

He answered that the British Government would certainly be willing to enter upon a negotiation on the commercial relations of the two countries, but that he had no authority to say that the colonial system could be essentially altered; broken down it could not be. I said, that if it was not to be departed from, or in no further degree than the four articles had imported, as those articles had already been rejected, it did not appear to me that any advantage would be likely to arise from going into the negotiation. He replied that he was not prepared to answer definitively upon all or any of the points, but would lay them before the Cabinet, and let me know the result. He professed earnestly, in the course of the conversation, the desire which this Government had to see the commerce of the two countries stand upon the best footing of intercourse, the stake to each being so great, and promising, with the growth of the United States, to be so much greater.

In the event of a negotiation, upon the grounds I had explained, not being opened, he asked if I could inform him what the intentions of my Government were relative to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, it being, for obvious reasons, desirable soon to know. Here I did not hesitate to announce that, in such an event, which I still hoped would not be the case, it was willing simply to renew the existing convention of 1815, thus keeping this instrument distinct from all other questions of a commercial nature, if the British Government preferred it. This communication, I thought, he received with evident satisfaction. He remarked that it would rescue the commercial relations from all danger of a chasm, and make known, in immediate reply, the readiness of his Government to acquiesce in such a course.

On the 22d I received a note from him requesting him to see me again at the Foreign Office on the 23d. I was there accordingly. Mr. Robinson, who is now a member of the Cabinet, as well as President of the Board of Trade, was present. It was the first occasion upon which any third person had been associated with Lord Castlereagh at any of our official interviews.

His Lordship commenced by saying that he had laid my proposals before the Cabinet, and that it had been agreed to enter upon the general negotiation; that is, one which should embrace all the points I had stated. In relation to the great commercial question, he begged I would understand that the British Government did not pledge itself beforehand to a departure from its colonial system in a degree beyond what it had already offered; but that it was sincerely desirous to make the attempt, and unequivocally wished to bring the whole commercial relations of the two countries into view; willing to hope, though abstaining from promises, that some modification of that system, mutually beneficial, might be the result of frank and full discussions renewed at the present juncture. I replied that I knew my Government would hear this determination with great satisfaction; that it would cordially join in the hope that the new effort might be productive of advantage to both countries, and strengthen the ties of good intercourse that should unite them.

I now informed him that Mr. Gallatin, the present Minister from the United States at Paris, would take part in the negotiation, and come over to London as soon as it would be convenient to say that Plenipotentiaries would be appointed on the part of Great Britain. He said, the sooner the better; and that Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn would be named to treat with us. His Lordship said that he himself would be obliged to set out for the Continent to attend the European Congress, by the 20th or 25th of next month, but that the negotiation could go on in his absence. He intimated a wish, however, that it might open, if practicable, before he went away. I answered that all the necessary powers and instructions from our Government had not yet reached us, but that we were in daily expectation of them.

He next asked whether, in order to guard against all possible delays that might be incident to the general negotiation, which was to embrace so many points, I was prepared to agree at once to a renewal of the convention of 1815, for a term of years to be agreed on, declaring that the British Government was ready, at any moment, to concur in such agreement.

I answered, without reserve, that I was already in possession of a full power to this effect, which, independently of other objects, might be carried into execution.

I wrote yesterday to Mr. Gallatin, to apprise him of the necessity of coming over, the contingency which was to bring him having happened. From the answer I have received to my letter to him of the 2d of this month, I think it probable that he will be here in three weeks, or sooner; so that, if our full powers arrive, the negotiation may be opened before Lord Castlereagh's departure. Should Mr. Gallatin concur, we will make the renewal of the convention for eight, ten, or twelve years, our first act. This I hope the President will approve. The reasons that operate with me, are, 1. It will not only provide against delays, but all uncertainties in the result, of the possibility of which we are forewarned simultaneously with the desire expressed to enter the field of negotiation. It is not only important that there should be no chasm in the commercial relations between the two countries, but equally so that our merchants should have timely notice that there will be none. 2. Every inquiry that I have made among merchants of the United States, with whom I have been able to confer in this city, has produced the most unequivocal opinions that this convention is working well for us, which entirely falls in with the communications I have received from the Department. 3. Taking this for the fact, it seems naturally to follow that it is our part to consent to the renewal the moment that Britain says she will, lest the day should go by. On this head I will just state that I have heard, through a respectable source, that there are already some British ship owners in Liverpool, who talk of petitioning their Government against its renewal. Lastly, my power to renew seems to me, from your despatch of the 30th of May, to be complete; nor will its exercise thwart, in any degree, our prospects of a more enlarged treaty under the general negotiation.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 28, 1818.

In the expectation that the Government of Great Britain have accepted the proposal which Mr. Rush was instructed to make, for negotiating a treaty of commerce, embracing the continuance of the convention of 3d July, 1815, for an additional term of years, and including other objects of interest to the two nations, I have now the honor of transmitting to you the President's instructions to you for the conduct of the negotiation.

With regard to the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815, you have already been informed that the President is willing that it should be continued without alteration for a further term of eight or ten years. We had flattered ourselves, from the liberal sentiments expressed by Lord Castlereagh in Parliament, and from various other indications, that the British Cabinet would have been now prepared to extend the principles of the convention to our commercial intercourse with their colonies in the West Indies and North America; but, from the report of two conferences between Mr. Rush and Lord Castlereagh, since received, it appears that our anticipations had been too sanguine, and that, with regard to our admission into their colonies, they still cling to the system of exclusive colonial monopoly.

Our navigation act, passed at the last session of Congress, is well calculated to bring this system to a test by which it has not hitherto been tried; and if the experiment must be made complete, so that the event shall prove to demonstration which of the two countries can best stand this opposition of counter-exclusions, the United States are prepared to abide by the result. Still, we should prefer to remove them at once, if for no other reason than that it would have a tendency to promote good humor between the two countries. We wish you to urge this argument upon the British Cabinet; to remind them of the principles avowed by Lord Castlereagh in Parliament, to which I have before referred, and of their precise bearing upon this question. It may also be proper to suggest that, while Great Britain is pressing upon Spain the abandonment of her commercial monopoly throughout the continent of South America, her recommendation must necessarily gain great additional weight by setting the example with her own colonies, while at the same time her own interest in her monopoly must be reduced to an object too trifling for national consideration, when the Spanish colonies shall be open to the commerce of the world. Finally, it may be observed that the free port act passed at the last session of Parliament, goes already so far as the abandonment of their system, that it can scarcely be perceived why they should adhere to the remnant of it any longer. Other arguments may occur to your own reflections, and result from your thorough knowledge of the subject; you will urge them with earnestness, though giving it always to be understood that we shall acquiesce in their ultimate determination.

Whenever this subject has been presented to the British Cabinet, since the peace, their only objection to the proposals and arguments of the United States has been that their system has been long established. Lord Castlereagh has invariably acknowledged his own doubts whether it was wise, or really advantageous to Great Britain, but placed the determination to preserve it upon the single ground of its having long existed. Whatever weight there is in this reasoning, it would bear in favor of all those other exclusions which he congratulated Parliament and the country at having been abolished, as much as in support of this. It is the argument of all existing abuse against reformation—of mere facts against reason and justice. The commercial intercourse between the United States and the West Indies is founded upon mutual wants and upon mutual convenience; upon their relative geographical position; upon the nature of their respective productions; upon the necessities of the climate; and upon the convulsions of nature. When the British Ministry say, Against all this our ancestors established a system, and therefore we must maintain it; we may reply, If your ancestors established a system in defiance of the laws of nature, it is your interest and your duty to abolish it. But who can overlook or be blind to the changes of circumstances since the establishment of the system; to the irresistible consequences of the establishment and growth of the United States as an independent Power; to the expulsion of the French from St. Domingo; to the revolution in progress in the South American provinces? Every system established upon a condition of things essentially transient and temporary must be accommodated to the changes produced by time.

Besides the free port act, a printed copy of which has now been received from Mr. Rush, and which, we find, is limited to ports specially to be appointed by the Crown, in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, we have seen in the public journals a bill for permitting a certain trade between the British West Indies and any colony or possession in the West Indies, or on the continent of America, under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State. This measure appears intended to counteract the effects of our late navigation act, and gives further manifestation of the adherence of the British Government to their colonial exclusions. It is the President's desire that nothing should be omitted which can have the tendency to convince them that a change would promote the best interests of both countries, as well as the harmony between them. Should your efforts prove ineffectual, we can only wait the result of the counteracting measures to which we have resorted, or which may be found necessary hereafter.

In carrying the convention of 3d July, 1815, into execution, the British Government have sanctioned the practice, with regard to some of the foreign tonnage duties; first, to levy them as if the convention were not in force, and then, upon petition of the persons interested, to have them returned. If this practice cannot be given up altogether, it will be necessary that some regulation should be adopted, by which the extra duties shall be returned of course, and without putting the parties to the trouble, expense, and delay of obtaining it by petition. At present, unless the petition is presented, the duties are not returned. It happens sometimes that masters of vessels pay the duties, without knowing that they are entitled to have them returned; in which case they are lost to them or their owners. It will be proper, therefore, to require the adoption of some general regulation; in virtue of which it shall be made the duty of the officers of the customs to repay the extra duties, in all cases in which they shall have been levied, without exposing the individual to lose his right by his own ignorance, or by the negligence or infidelity of his consignee.

2. Slaves.

The British Government have accepted the proposal of referring to the decision of some friendly Sovereign or State, the question concerning the slaves carried away from the United States by British officers after the ratification of the peace. They propose, however, a previous reference of it to two commissioners, appointed like those under the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, and to proceed with similar powers; and committing to the same commissioners the power of fixing definitively the boundary between the United States and the possessions of Great Britain, westward, from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods; and of pronouncing upon the right of the United States to the settlement on the shores of the Pacific ocean, at the mouth of Columbia river. These objects are so entirely different from one another; the principles, the character of the evidence, and the reasoning which must lead to the result, are so disconnected and incongruous, that, if submitted at all to commissioners, it is obviously proper to refer them to different commissions. The question concerning the slaves is a question of construction upon the terms of the first article of the treaty, and the two Governments having already discussed it, each, after discussion, adhering to its own opinion, there is little prospect that either of the commissioners will come to a conclusion different from that of his own Government. The present offer of the British Government, connecting it with another question of boundary, bears the appearance of a disposition to make it an affair of compromise, and that they are willing to concede something to us on one of the points, upon condition of a concession from us upon another. If this be their object, these mutual concessions may be made with more convenience by direct and immediate agreement between the two Governments, and by an article of the treaty, than by the means of commissioners, whose functions are rather of the judicial than the ministerial character, and whose duties are to decide, and not to compromise.

3. Boundary, from the Lake of the Woods, westward.

By the second article of the treaty of peace of 1783, the boundaries of the United States, after having been traced from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, are pursued "from thence, on a due west course, to the river Mississippi; thence, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the said river Mississippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude."

By the fourth article of the treaty of 1794, it was declared to be uncertain whether the river Mississippi extended so far to the northward as to be intersected by a line due west from the Lake of the Woods; and a joint survey of the river, from one degree below the falls of St. Anthony to the principal sources of the said river, and of the parts adjacent thereto, was stipulated; and if, on the result of the survey, it appeared that the river would not be intersected by the line, the parties were to regulate the boundary line by amicable negotiation, according to justice and mutual convenience, and in conformity to the intent of the treaty. This joint survey never took effect.

By a convention signed on the 12th of May, 1803, by Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury, but which was not ratified, it was agreed that the boundary should be by a line from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, by the shortest line, until it touched the river Mississippi. Until then, the Mississippi river had been the western boundary of the United States. The cession of Louisiana gave them a new and extensive territory westward of that river.

In the negotiation of 1807, between Messrs. Monroe and W. Pinkney, and the Lords Holland and Auckland, there were three successive draughts of articles for the settlement of this boundary. The first, proposed on the British side, was a line due west from the Lake of the Woods, along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, as far as the territories of the United States extend in that quarter, and the line, to that extent, was to form the boundary; with a proviso that the article should not be construed to extend to the northwest coast of America, or to territories westward of the Stony mountains.

The second, proposed on the part of the United States, took a line due north or south, as the case might be, from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, until it shall intersect the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and then due west, along that parallel, for the boundary between the territories of the parties; with the proviso excluding the northwest coast and all territories westward of the Stony mountains.

The third was agreed to by both parties, and varied from the second only by an additional clause, purporting that this should be the boundary, as far as the respective territories of the parties extend in that quarter.

That convention was not ultimately concluded. At the negotiation of the Peace of Ghent, the eight article of the first project, presented by the American Plenipotentiaries, was a transcript from this article last above mentioned; and the article proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries on returning the project was the same as that which had been first proposed by Lords Holland and Auckland, with an additional paragraph, stipulating free access to British subjects through the territories of the United States to the Mississippi, and free navigation of that river. In the conferences that ensued, the substance of the article, so far as it regarded the boundary, was agreed to on both sides; but, as the American Plenipotentiaries could not accede to the additional paragraph, the article was finally altogether omitted.

From the earnestness with which the British Government now return to the object of fixing this boundary, there is reason to believe that they have some other purpose connected with it, which they do not avow, but which, in their estimation, gives it an importance not belonging to it, considered in itself. An attempt was at first made by them, at the negotiation of Ghent, to draw the boundary line from Lake Superior to the Mississippi. But, as they afterwards not only abandoned that pretension, but gave up even the pretension to an article renewing their right to the navigation of the Mississippi, it was to have been expected they would thenceforth have considered this western boundary of no importance to them. The new pretension, however, of disputing our title to the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river, either indicates a design on their part to encroach, by new establishments of their own, upon the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, south of which they can have no valid claim upon this continent; or it manifests a jealousy of the United States—a desire to check the progress of our settlements—of which it might have been supposed the experience would before this day have relieved them. Their projects for the line, both in the negotiation of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney in 1806, and at Ghent in 1814, were to take the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, from the Lake of the Woods west, as far as the territories of the United States extend in that direction, with a caveat against its extension to the South sea, or beyond the Stony mountains. Upon which, two observations are to be made—first, that it is uncertain whether any part of the Lake of the Woods is in latitude forty-nine; and, secondly, that they always affected to apply the indefinite limit of extension "as far as the territories extend," to the territories of the United States, and not to those of Great Britain—leaving a nest-egg for future pretensions, on their part, south of latitude forty-nine. The counter-projects for the line on our part, therefore, at both those negotiations, were from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, the point already fixed and undisputed, a line due north or south, as the case may be, to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; and thence along that parallel, due west, as far as the territories of both parties extend in that direction, and adopting the caveat against extension to the Pacific, or beyond the Stony mountains.

4. Settlement at the mouth of Columbia river.

From the late correspondence with the Spanish Minister, (Onís,) it appears that the claim of Spain upon the shores of the South sea extends to the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude; but there is a Russian settlement in fifty-five, besides a temporary lodgment connected with it, as far South as forty-two. The pretensions of the British Government may on this occasion be disclosed. We know not precisely what they are, nor have they explained the grounds or the motives upon which they contest our right to the settlement called Astoria, formed before the late war, and broken up by the British sloop-of-war Racoon in the course of it. The papers enclosed, marked from A to I, contain all the information material to the subject possessed by this Department. It appears that, at the time when the American settlement was broken up during the war, the property was purchased by certain agents of the British Northwest Company. This, however, could in no manner divest the United States of their jurisdiction. As the British Government admit explicitly their obligation under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent to restore the post, there can be no question with regard to the right of the United States to resume it. We do not perceive how or why this question should be referred to two Commissioners of the respective nations. And as Russia herself has pretensions on that coast, it deserves the consideration of both parties whether the ultimate determination, in the almost unavoidable case of a difference between the Commissioners, could with propriety be referred to her Sovereign. Mr. Rush has been instructed, in the event of a final difference between the Commissioners, under the existing commissions, to propose the Emperor of Russia as the Sovereign to whose decision the reference stipulated on that contingency in the treaty should be made. It cannot be doubted that he was the Sovereign contemplated by both parties at the time when the treaty was concluded; and it might be difficult to designate any other in whom the confidence of both parties would be so strong and clear as to secure their cordial acquiescence in his decision.

The expedient itself of submitting questions of territorial rights and boundaries in discussion between two nations to the decision of a third was unusual, if not entirely new; and, should the contingency occur, will probably encounter difficulties of execution not foreseen at the time when the stipulation was made of resorting to it. The subjects in controversy are of a nature too intricate and complicated, requiring on the part of the arbitrator a patience of investigation and research—historical, political, legal, geographical, and astronomical—for which it is impossible to conceive that the Sovereign of a great Empire could personally bestow the time.

These ideas are suggested with a view to recommend the attempt rather to come to an agreement between the parties themselves, upon all subjects which have not been thoroughly discussed between them, than to cast their difficulties upon Commissioners, who can scarcely be expected to agree concerning them, and then upon a foreign Sovereign, of whose personal integrity no doubt can be entertained, but who cannot have leisure to sift the subjects in dispute to the bottom.

On the whole, the President will be well satisfied if these three objects—of indemnity for the slaves carried away, of the western boundary from the Lake of the Woods, and of the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river—can be adjusted by this negotiation, rather than referred to commissioners, which must be expensive, and so constituted as to make it at least probable that they will decide nothing; and then to a friendly sovereign, still at great expense and other inconveniences to both parties. With regard to the slaves, the question which it was proposed should be submitted to the decision of an impartial arbitrator was merely on the construction of one paragraph in an article of the Treaty of Ghent. This was so simple, and requiring so little research or investigation of any kind, that it might have been decided immediately by the sovereign himself, upon an inspection of the article, and a short statement of the facts, to which both parties would have agreed. But the delineation of an unsettled boundary across the western deserts of this continent, the title to establishments on the Pacific ocean, where the arbitrator himself is not without his pretensions, and where, save pretensions, there is no object to any party worth contending for—to create burdensome commissions and make solemn references to a foreign sovereign for these, appears scarcely to be necessary, if altogether justifiable. As to the line from the Lake of the Woods, you are authorized to agree to that which was agreed upon by the Plenipotentiaries on both sides in 1807, but not to any line which would bring the British in contact with the Mississippi, nor to anything which would authorize the British to trade with Indians within the boundaries of the United States. Of the inconveniences of allowing such trade, even by licenses, a recent instance has occurred; copies of the papers relating to which are transmitted to you.

5. Fisheries.

The proceedings, deliberations, and communications upon this subject, which took place at the negotiation of Ghent, will be fresh in the remembrance of Mr. Gallatin. Mr. Rush possesses copies of the correspondence with the British Government relating to it after the conclusion of the peace, and of that which has passed here between Mr. Bagot and this Government. Copies of several letters received by members of Congress during the late session, from the parts of the country most deeply interested in the fisheries, are now transmitted.

The President authorizes you to agree to an article whereby the United States will desist from the liberty of fishing, and curing and drying fish, within the British jurisdiction generally, upon condition that it shall be secured as a permanent right, not liable to be impaired by any future war, from Cape Ray to the Ramea islands, and from Mount Joli, on the Labrador coast, through the Strait of Belleisle, indefinitely north, along the coast; the right to extend as well to, curing and drying the fish as to fishing.

By the decree of the judge of the vice-admiralty court at Halifax, on the 29th of August last, in the case of several American fishing vessels which had been captured and sent into that port, a copy of which is also now transmitted to you, it appears that all those captures have been illegal. An appeal from this decree was entered by the captors to the appellate court in England, and the owners of the captured vessels were obliged to give bonds to stand the issue of the appeal. Mr. Rush was instructed to employ suitable counsel for these cases, if the appeals should be entered and, as we have been informed by him, has accordingly done so. If you do not succeed in agreeing upon an article on this subject, it will be desirable that the question upon the right should be solemnly argued before the Lords of Appeals, and that counsel of the first eminence should be employed in it. Judge Wallace agreed with the Advocate General that the late war completely dissolved every right of the people of the United States acquired by the treaty of 1783. But it does not appear that this question had been argued before him, and the contrary opinion is not to be surrendered on the part of the United States upon the dictum of a vice-admiralty court. Besides this, we claim the rights in question not as acquired by the treaty of 1783, but as having always before enjoyed them, and as only recognised as belonging to us by that treaty, and therefore never to be divested from us, but by our own consent. Judge Wallace, however, explicitly says that he does not see how he can condemn these vessels without an act of Parliament; and whoever knows anything of the English constitution must see that on this point he is unquestionably right. He says indeed something about an Order in Council, but it is very clear that would not answer. It is a question of forfeiture for a violated territorial jurisdiction; which forfeiture can be incurred, not by the law of nations, but only by the law of the land. There is obviously no such law.

The argument which has been so long and so ably maintained by Mr. Reeves, that the rights of antennati Americans, as British subjects, even within the Kingdom of Great Britain, have never been divested from them, because there has been no act of Parliament to declare it, applies in its fullest force to this case; and, connected with the article in the treaty of 1783, by which this particular right was recognised, confirmed, and placed out of the reach of an act of Parliament, corroborates the argument in our favor. How far it may be proper and advisable to use these suggestions in your negotiation, must be left to your sound discretion; but they are thrown out with the hope that you will pursue the investigation of the important questions of British law involved in this interest, and that every possible advantage may be taken of them, preparatory for the trial before the Lords of Appeals, if the case should ultimately come to their decision. The British Government may be well assured that not a particle of these rights will be finally yielded by the United States without a struggle, which will cost Great Britain more than the worth of the prize.

These are the subjects to which the President is willing that your negotiation should be confined. With regard to the others of a general nature, and relating to the respective rights of the two nations in times of maritime war, you are authorized to treat of them, and to conclude concerning them, conformably to the instructions already in possession of Mr. Rush; or, if the difficulty of agreeing upon the principles should continue as great as it has been hitherto, you may omit them altogether.

You will not fail to transmit, by duplicates, the result of your conferences, at as early a period as may be found practicable.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Gallatin, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1818.

This letter is merely to request you, in case the British Government should have accepted the proposal for that negotiation, and if you should be still in Paris when you receive it, to repair without delay to London, for the purpose of entering upon the negotiation. It is hoped you will be able to finish it, and to transmit the result here for the meeting of Congress, on the third Monday in November.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, August 13, 1818.

On the day before yesterday I received a letter from Mr. Gallatin, dated the 6th of this month. He informs me that the full powers have got to hand, and that he expects to be here on the 16th.

The prospect of opening the negotiation before the departure of Lord Castlereagh seems, therefore, now to be good. I went yesterday to the Foreign Office to request that the proper orders may be expedited to Dover for the entrance of Mr. Gallatin, his family, and baggage, into the kingdom, without molestation or delay.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, August 15, 1818.

On the evening of the 13th I received a note from Lord Castlereagh, requesting me to call at the Foreign Office yesterday at four o'clock. I went accordingly, when a conversation took place, which I proceed to relate.

The ostensible object of the interview was to say to me that some circumstances would prevent the Congress assembling at Aix-la-Chapelle earlier than the 20th of September, which would make it unnecessary for him to go away quite as soon as he had originally contemplated. He was glad of this, he added, as it would insure to him an opportunity of being present here when the negotiation, so soon to take place between the two countries, commenced. I informed him of our full powers having been received, and of the expectation I now had of Mr. Gallatin's arrival in a day or two. He subjoined a few words as to the formal manner in which it appeared to him best that the negotiation should move along, and also to apprise me that, although he expected to go into the country to-morrow, he would be in town again on the 25th. Here this part of the conversation closed.

He next surprised me agreeably by reviving the subject of impressment, which I thought had been blotted out from our conferences. He began by premising that what he was going to say was confidential, and, for the present, without the knowledge of his colleagues in the administration; that he had reflected much and anxiously upon my late proposals, which, it was true, had, as they now stood, been rejected. But, feeling anew the importance of this subject to the future harmony of the two countries, and willing, if possible, not to let it be shut out from the general negotiation upon the eve of opening, it had occurred to him to offer some suggestions in relation to it, barely to see how they struck my mind, and know if there would be a motive to pursue them. He went on to say that his own impression was, (protesting that, as yet, he was not authorized to say it was that of his Government,) that the proposals might be rendered acceptable by some modifications very important to Great Britain, and not at all so, as he supposed, to the primary object in view by the United States. The modifications were these:

1. That any treaty or convention, built up upon the proposals as I had submitted them, should be limited in duration, say to eight, ten, or twelve years, with liberty to each party to be absolved from its stipulations on a notice of three or six months, as in the late arrangement respecting the reciprocal dismantlement of naval armaments upon the lakes.

2. That the British boarding officer, entering American ships at sea for a purpose justified under the laws of nations, should have the liberty of calling for the list of the crew; and, if he saw a seaman known to him, or on good grounds suspected to be an Englishman, that he should have the further privilege of making a record or proces verbal of the fact, in such way as to have the case distinctly brought under the notice of our Government, though by no means withdrawing the man from the ship.

The latter regulation, his Lordship observed, would operate as a further incentive to the faithful execution of our home prohibitions for excluding British subjects from our vessels; and the former guard against any irrevocable relinquishments by Great Britain, which the opinions, or even the prejudices, of the country might not, upon trial, be found to bear.

I naturally infer that this Government, reviewing its late decision, and seeing, at last, the unexceptionable and perfect fairness of the offers of the United States, has made up its mind to abandon, in effect, the great principle, or at least practice, to which, with an injustice so tenacious, it has long clung—that of forcing the man from under the sacred cover of our flag; and that ground has been broken, in the above interview, to the consummation of a change so auspicious in the councils of this nation. The first modification seems to me unobjectionable. The second is open to considerations which I do not at all like; yet it comes as a first suggestion, and we may, therefore, hope to get rid of it altogether. As Mr. Gallatin will be here so soon, I forbore to offer to his Lordship any opinion, not feeling myself now at liberty to speak upon the subject singly; but joining, nevertheless, in the renewed anxiety to see it brought within the pale of our approaching discussions, and stating that I thought fair ground was laid for its admission. I take leave of the subject, therefore, until my endeavors, jointly with those of Mr. Gallatin, shall be resumed upon it, having been first led to this communication for the President's early information on a question of so much interest. My despatch of the 26th of June will show that some intimation was thrown out, at that time, of an intention on the part of this Government to give, in writing, its objections to our propositions; instead of which, more just views of them would happily seem to have risen up.

LONDON, August 28, 1818.

Mr. Gallatin got here on the 16th of this month. On the following day I addressed a note to Lord Castlereagh, announcing his arrival. His Lordship was at his country seat, thirteen miles from London, but invited us to an informal conference there on the 22d. We went accordingly, and remained all night. Nothing could have been more cordial than the reception given to us. Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn were present. The several subjects of the negotiation were talked over in general terms, and in a spirit which, we think, promises well for the friendly manner in which, at all events, it will be conducted.

The full powers of Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn having in the meantime been made out, our first official meeting took place yesterday at the office of the Board of Trade. Nothing of importance passed, beyond a recapitulation of the points which the two Governments desire to bring into discussion, and some attempts to settle the order in which the negotiation should proceed.

The points consist of all such as have been given in charge to us, and which have been heretofore mentioned in my despatches, including impressment, and other maritime questions incident to a state of war.

I content myself at present with stating thus generally, for the President's information, that the negotiation has opened. What relates to its progress will, I presume, no longer be expected from me singly, but in joint communications with Mr. Gallatin.

I ought not to omit to mention that the point of impressment was brought forward by Lord Castlereagh, at the first interview held at his house, on the 22d. The next meeting takes place to-morrow.

There are some of the points which must stand still until we are in possession of our further instructions.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, October 12, 1818.

At the joint meeting which took place on the 9th, nothing decisive was determined upon. Premising that no opinion which I give at this stage of the negotiation must be taken as at all binding, I will barely say that I think the prospect of coming to any agreement on an article regulating our trade with the West Indies grows more and more faint. We are to have another conference to-morrow.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, October 19, 1818.

I hasten to communicate to you, for the information of the President, that, at a conference we have this day had with the British Plenipotentiaries, from which I have just returned, it has been agreed to conclude a treaty, comprehending an arrangement of the following points:

1st. The fisheries; 2d. The northwestern boundary line; 3d. That about Columbia river; 4th. The question of slaves; and 5th. A renewal for ten years of the present commercial convention.

The treaty will probably be reduced to form, and signed to-morrow.

Extracts of a letter from Messrs. Gallatin and Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, October 20, 1818.

We have the honor to transmit a convention which we concluded this day with the British Plenipotentiaries.

Lord Castlereagh having expressed a wish that the negotiations might be opened before his departure for Aix-la-Chapelle, Mr. Gallatin left Paris as soon as he had received our full powers, and arrived here on the 16th of August. Our joint instructions contained in your despatch of the 28th of July did not, however, reach us till the 3d of September. We had long conversations with Lord Castlereagh at his country seat, on the 22d and 23d of August, but could not, owing to our instructions not having arrived, discuss with him the questions of the fisheries and of the West India intercourse. He left London on the 1st of September. The official conferences had begun on the 27th of August, and, for the progress of the negotiation, we beg leave to refer to the enclosed copies of the protocol, and documents annexed to it, and of two unofficial notes sent by us to the British Plenipotentiaries. We will add some observations on the several objects embraced by the convention.

1. Fisheries.

We succeeded in securing, besides the right of taking and curing fish within the limits designated by our instructions as a sine qua non, the liberty of fishing on the coasts of the Magdalen islands, and on the western coast of Newfoundland, and the privilege of entering for shelter, wood, and water, in all the British harbors of North America. Both were suggested as important to our fishermen, in the communications on that subject which were transmitted to us with our instructions. To the exception of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company we did not object, as it was virtually implied in the treaty of 1783, and we had never, any more than the British subjects, enjoyed any right there—the charter of that company having been granted in the year 1670. The exception applies only to the coasts and their harbors, and does not affect the right of fishing in Hudson's Bay beyond three miles from the shores, a right which could not exclusively belong to, or be granted by, any nation.

The most difficult part of the negotiation related to the permanence of the right. To obtain the insertion in the body of the convention of a provision declaring expressly that that right should not be abrogated by war, was impracticable. All that could be done was to express the article in such manner as would not render the right liable to be thus abrogated. The words "for ever" were inserted for that purpose, and we also made the declaration annexed to the protocol of the third conference, the principal object of which was to provide in any event for the revival of all our prior rights. The insertion of the words "for ever" was strenuously resisted. The British Plenipotentiaries urged that, in case of war, the only effect of those words being omitted, or of the article being considered as abrogated, would be the necessity of inserting in the treaty of peace a new article renewing the present one; and that, after all that had passed, it would certainly be deemed expedient to do it, in whatever manner the condition was now expressed. We declared that we would not agree to any article on the subject, unless the words were preserved, or in case they should enter on the protocol a declaration impairing their effect.

It will also be perceived that we insisted on the clause by which the United States renounce their right to the fisheries relinquished by the convention, that clause having been omitted in the first British counter-projet. We insisted on it with the view, 1st. Of preventing any implication that the fisheries secured to us were a new grant, and of placing the permanence of the rights secured and of those renounced precisely on the same footing. 2d. Of its being expressly stated that our renunciation extended only to the distance of three miles from the coasts. This last point was the more important, as, with the exception of the fishery in open boats within certain harbors, it appeared, from the communications abovementioned, that the fishing ground, on the whole coast of Nova Scotia, is more than three miles from the shore; whilst, on the contrary, it is almost universally close to the shore on the coasts of Labrador. It is in that point of view that the privilege of entering the ports for shelter is useful, and it is hoped that, with that provision, a considerable portion of the actual fisheries on that coast (of Nova Scotia) will, notwithstanding the renunciation, be preserved.

2. Boundary line.

This being definitively fixed at the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, from the Lake of the Woods to the Stony mountains, it is unnecessary to repeat the arguments which were urged on that subject. The attempt was again made to connect with it an article, securing to the British access to the Mississippi, and the right to its navigation. We declared, and entered the declaration in the protocol, that we could not agree to the article, nor to any that would bring the British in contact with that river. The British Plenipotentiaries having, by the protocol of the seventh conference, agreed to the omission of the article, that point is also definitively settled. And it may be observed, with reference to the treaty of 1783, that, if the United States have not secured to themselves the whole of the fisheries heretofore enjoyed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, they have obtained the liberty of curing fish on a part of the southern coast of Newfoundland, and the abandonment of an inconvenient privilege within their own territory.

3. Columbia River.

This subject was, during the whole negotiation, connected by the British Plenipotentiaries with that of the boundary line. They appeared altogether unwilling to agree to this in any shape, unless some arrangement was made with respect to the country westward of the Stony mountains. This induced us to propose an extension of the boundary line, due west, to the Pacific ocean. We did not assert that the United States had a perfect right to that country, but insisted that their claim was at least good against Great Britain. The forty-ninth degree of north latitude had, in pursuance of the Treaty of Utrecht, been fixed, indefinitely, as the line between the northern British possessions and those of France, including Louisiana, now a part of our territories. There was no reason why, if the two countries extended their claims westward, the same line should not be continued to the Pacific ocean. So far as discovery gave a claim, ours to the whole country on the waters of the Columbia river was indisputable. It had derived its name from that of the American ship commanded by Captain Gray, who had first discovered and entered its mouth. It was first explored, from its sources to the ocean, by Lewis and Clark, and before the British traders from Canada had reached any of its waters; for it was now ascertained that the river Tacoutche Tesse, discovered by McKenzie, and which he had mistaken for the Columbia, was not a branch of this river, but fell into the sound called the "Gulf of Georgia." The settlement at the place called Astoria was also the first permanent establishment made in that quarter. The British Plenipotentiaries asserted that former voyages, and principally that of Captain Cook, gave to Great Britain the rights derived from discovery; and they alluded to purchases from the natives south of the river Columbia, which they alleged to have been made prior to the American Revolution. They did not make any formal proposition for a boundary, but intimated that the river itself was the most convenient that could be adopted, and that they would not agree to any that did not give them the harbor at the mouth of the river, in common with the United States. We stated that we could not agree to this, but expressed our readiness and our wish to insert, in the boundary article, a proviso similar to what had been proposed on former occasions, and which would leave that subject open for arrangement hereafter. To this they would not consent, and offered the article annexed to the protocol of the fifth conference. We declared that we preferred not signing any article for the boundary line eastward of the Stony mountains to acquiescing in that arrangement. We did not know with precision what value our Government set on the country to the westward of those mountains, but we were not authorized to enter into any agreement which would be tantamount to an abandonment of the claim to it. It was at last agreed, but, as we thought, with some reluctance on the part of the British Plenipotentiaries, that the country on the northwest coast, claimed by either party, should, without prejudice to the claims of either, and for a limited time, be opened, for the purpose of trade, to the inhabitants of both countries. The importance which seems to have been attached to that subject by Great Britain induces a belief that it will again be brought forward, at some future occasion, with a view to a definitive arrangement.

4. Slaves.

After having referred to what had already passed on that subject, we insisted that Lord Castlereagh, having, in his letter to Mr. Adams, of April 10, 1816, declared that "the British Government would not resist the claim of the United States to indemnification for slaves, or private property belonging to their citizens, which could be proved to have been in places directed to be restored by the Treaty of Ghent at the date of the ratifications, and to have been afterwards removed;" and it being in proof, by the correspondence of Captain Clavelle and of Admiral Cockburn, that slaves had been removed from Tangier Island and from Cumberland Island subsequent to the ratifications, the claim for indemnification, to that extent, had thus been already fully admitted by the British Government. With respect to slaves removed on ship-board previous to the ratifications, and for which Lord Castlereagh denied that our claim to indemnity could with justice extend, we urged that such of our harbors and waters as were in the possession of the British at the date of the ratifications were strictly within the meaning of places to be restored; that they were accordingly actually restored; and it necessarily followed that, according to Lord Castlereagh's construction, the British were bound not to have carried away any slaves who were then on board British vessels lying within any such harbors or waters.

The British Plenipotentiaries offered as a substitute to the article we had proposed one to refer the subject to a friendly sovereign. This we could not reject, as the proposal had originated with the United States, and was now unconnected with the questions respecting the boundary line and the Columbia river. We proposed that the Emperor of Russia should be designated in the article as the umpire. This was rejected, on the ground that, if he should refuse to act, the agreement would become null; and that it would be inexpedient, if at all practicable, to provide by the article for that contingency, so as to secure the object in view. It was added that the sovereign could be fixed upon at a future day by the two Governments, through Mr. Rush and Lord Castlereagh.

5. Commercial Intercourse.

The subject of the intercourse with the West Indies was fully discussed, and, not thinking ourselves authorized to accede to the last proposals of the British Plenipotentiaries, which are annexed to the protocol of the eighth conference, an entry was made that we had taken them ad referendum to our Government. The negotiation being kept open, in that respect, we agreed, in conformity with our instructions, to an article, continuing in force for ten years the commercial convention of 1815. It was fully understood, on both sides, that if no agreement should be ultimately concluded with respect to the colonial intercourse, no ground of complaint would arise on account of any restrictive measures whatever that the United States might adopt on that subject; and we stated, expressly, that such measures would, in all probability, be extended to the intercourse with Bermuda and with the British northern colonies; that, if the direct trade with the West Indies was not allowed, the United States would not be disposed to suffer it to be carried on through any other intermediate British port.

It appeared evident to us, both from our instructions and from the act of Congress, that a perfect reciprocity and equality must be the basis, as well as a sine qua non, of any arrangement of the intercourse with the West Indies. And we understood this basis to embrace the following objects:

1. British vessels to be permitted to import from the British West Indies into the United States, and to export from the United States to the British West Indies, only such articles of the produce of the said West Indies and of the United States, respectively, as American vessels should be permitted to export from and to import into the British West Indies.

2. The duties on the vessels and on the cargoes to be reciprocally the same, whether the vessels were American or British.

3. The duties on the importation of American produce into the British West Indies not to be higher when the produce was imported directly from the United States than when imported in a circuitous manner; with a reciprocal condition for the importation of West India produce into the United States.

4. The intercourse in British vessels to be allowed only with such West India ports as would be opened to the American vessels.

5. The British vessels allowed to carry on that trade to be only of the same description with the American vessels admitted in the British West Indies.

To that basis, as thus stated, the British Plenipotentiaries acceded. But when the further details of the proposed arrangement were taken into consideration, several important points occurred which had not been contemplated in our instructions, and on which we were not sufficiently acquainted with the intentions of our Government.

The basis of reciprocity once established, was it proper to agree to a direct intercourse, limited, on both sides, to certain articles of the produce either of the United States or of the West Indies? And if such limitation was admissible, to what extent? And what articles might we consent to except?

If the direct intercourse was thus limited to certain articles, would an indirect intercourse be admissible, between the United States and Bermuda, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, embracing articles of West India produce, or of the produce of the United States, destined for the West Indies, other than were admitted to be imported or exported in a direct manner?

As the British Government would retain the power of laying duties on the produce of the United States imported into the West Indies, and would not lay any on similar articles imported therein from any part of the British dominions, ought we to assent, without any condition or exception, to the clause annexed to the first article, formerly proposed by that Government, and by which no higher duties should be laid respectively, on the produce of either country, than on similar articles imported from any other foreign country?

We thought it safer to err on our own side of the question, and to ask for more than perhaps under all circumstances we expected to obtain, rather than to limit our demands to less than might be intended by our Government. The articles which we proposed at the third conference were drawn with that view; and the British Plenipotentiaries immediately stated that they were inadmissible, and amounted to a much greater departure from the colonial policy of Great Britain than she was prepared to allow. They did not enter into any abstract defence of that policy, but they strongly urged the impossibility of breaking down, at once, a system still favored by public opinion, and supported by various interests which could not be disregarded. The fish and lumber of the northern colonies, the salted provisions, and even the flour of Ireland, the shipping interest, and that of non-residing West India planters, were all alluded to. Having once admitted the basis of perfect reciprocity with respect to the direct intercourse, they thought that the United States ought, for the present, to be satisfied with an arrangement which would admit a considerable number of articles to be carried directly; that they should not insist on the exclusion, in the intercourse with Halifax, St. John's, and Bermuda, of those articles which might not be included in the list of those admitted in the direct intercourse with the West Indies; and that we ought not to object to the natural right of Great Britain to lay protecting duties in favor of the produce of her own possessions.

We admitted that the last principle, as an abstract proposition, was unexceptionable, but observed, that the practical effect of the condition on which they insisted was altogether partial. Since they persevered in making a distinction between the intercourse with England and that with her colonies, and even between that with her northern American colonies and that with the West Indies, the United States must, in a commercial view, consider them as so many distinct countries. As no other foreign country could supply the West Indies with the articles which were the produce of the United States, a condition which would prevent Great Britain from laying higher duties on that produce than on similar articles the produce of other foreign countries, was nugatory, and to us perfectly useless. There was, in that respect, no competition but with the produce of the British possessions. We found, in that condition, no compensation for the restriction which it would impose on the United States to lay no higher duties on the colonial produce of the British possessions than on that of other countries. The propriety of limiting the number of articles to be carried directly, would in a great measure depend on the list which might be proposed. To extend it to other articles, in the circuitous intercourse through Halifax and Bermuda, would give to the British the exclusive carriage of those articles from those ports to the West Indies, and vice versa, and be inconsistent with the avowed object of the United States—that of an equal participation in the navigation necessary for the transportation of the articles of which their trade with the West Indies, as allowed by Great Britain, actually consisted. Yet we were disposed to pay due regard to the various considerations which had been presented by Great Britain, and to listen to any specific proposals she might be prepared to make. No part of the articles we had offered was, with the exception of the basis of perfect reciprocity, to be considered as an ultimatum. We would, however, say that we could not assent to any article which did not admit, on the one hand, naval stores and the whole of our lumber, and, on the other, salt, molasses, and, besides rum, a limited quantity of sugar and coffee, amongst the articles of the direct trade.

With respect to duties, after having suggested without success that a maximum of those intended for the protection of the produce of the British dominions might be agreed on, we stated that there were at least two provisions which could not be objected to, viz., that the United States should remain at liberty to lay higher duties on the colonial produce of the British possessions than on that of those countries where we were or might be received on better terms than in the British West Indies; and that the condition which would preclude generally such higher duties being laid should not apply to the West India articles not admitted to be exported directly therefrom in American vessels to the United States.

The result of several free conversations was, that, as it was altogether improbable that we could, at this time, come to a definitive arrangement, the British Plenipotentiaries should offer an article with the intention of its being referred to our Government.

It will be perceived by this, that they admit the principle of reciprocity; that they make no exception with respect to the description of vessels; that, giving up the article formerly proposed for Turk's Island, they also admit that vessels employed in the trade may touch from one port to another, and that to the list of articles formerly proposed are added naval stores, shingles, and staves, and a more general description of provisions. They continue to except altogether, on the one hand, sugar and coffee, and, on the other, salted fish and provisions, and every other species of lumber but shingles and staves. The only essential difference between this list of articles and that proposed for the intercourse with Bermuda and the northern colonies consists, as far as relates to the produce of the United States, in the lumber not admitted in the direct intercourse; for salted fish and provisions are equally excluded from both; but it is proposed that not only sugar and coffee, but also all articles of the produce or manufacture of any of the British dominions, should be admitted through that indirect channel into the United States. We stated, when we received the article, that it ought to embrace only American products, and that the proposal was certainly inadmissible so far as related to East India articles.

With respect to the ports they offer in the West Indies, they are the same with those proposed by us, with the exception of St. Christopher's, St. Lucia, Demarara, Esequibo, and Berbice. The three last had been at first intended to be included, but were ultimately omitted by the British Plenipotentiaries, for reasons connected, as they said, with their engagements with Holland.

We cannot state what may be considered as an ultimatum in that proposal. We are, however, induced to believe that they will persevere in excluding sugar and some species of lumber from the direct, and salted fish and provisions from both the direct and indirect intercourse; that they will insist on having some articles admitted in that indirect, which shall be excluded from the direct intercourse; and that they will be tenacious on being placed on the footing of the most favored nation. They will also certainly insist that vessels from Great Britain may touch at any port in the United States, and take cargoes for the West Indies of such articles as may be admitted in the direct trade. Without such provision (which would be made reciprocal, although only nominally so,) it is supposed here, that, considering our proximity, to admit our vessels to a participation on an equal footing in the trade between the United States and the West Indies, would, in fact, give the latter the whole navigation connected with that trade. It must, at the same time, be observed, that the proposal being intended for reference, and not for immediate discussion, the British Plenipotentiaries may have been cautious not to go too far. Upon the whole, we hope that, if our negotiation does not pave the way for a definitive arrangement, it will at least have served to make our Government better acquainted with the dispositions of this, and may afford some assistance with respect to the further proceedings which may be thought expedient.

It having been ascertained that the British Government would not assent to any article on the subject of the intercourse by land and inland navigation with Canada, which would substantially differ from that already twice rejected, and that they would not even agree to a provision securing to us the right of taking our produce in our own boats or vessels down the St. Lawrence as far as Montreal, and down the river Chambly as far as the river St. Lawrence, we thought it altogether unnecessary to make any proposal on that subject, on which, indeed, we were not particularly instructed.

No. 1.

Protocol of the first conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on the 27th of August, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush, American; and Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn, British.

The Plenipotentiaries presented and exchanged their respective full powers.

It was agreed that the discussions should be carried on by conference and protocol, with the insertion in the protocol of such written documents as either party might deem necessary, for the purpose of recording their sentiments in detail.

The British Plenipotentiaries stated that they were ready to proceed at once to the signature of a treaty, renewing the commercial convention of 1815 as it stands; or, that if the American Plenipotentiaries should prefer to delay the signature of such a treaty of renewal till more progress should have been made in the discussion of the other topics which it is the object of the two Governments to arrange, no objection would be made to the adoption of that course. But it was explicitly stated by the British Plenipotentiaries, that, with respect to all those other topics of discussion, whether purely commercial, or partaking more of a political character, they were instructed not to consent to any partial or separate consideration of them, nor to select any one in particular, as an appendage to a renewal of the existing commercial convention.

The American Plenipotentiaries acquiesced in the division of the subject, represented by the British Plenipotentiaries to be essential, but stated it to be their desire not to sign the treaty of renewal for the present. It was, however, agreed that the eventual signature of that instrument should not be made contingent upon a settlement of the other points, and both parties declined bringing forward any proposed modification of it.

It was agreed to meet again on Saturday at two o'clock.

No. 2.

Protocol of the second conference held between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, at Whitehall, on the 29th of August, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The Plenipotentiaries agreed upon and signed the protocol of the preceding conference. Some general conversation then ensued upon some of the different topics of discussion.

The American Plenipotentiaries stated that, whenever the British Plenipotentiaries were prepared to submit their project on the impressment question, they (the American Plenipotentiaries) would bring forward their proposition respecting the other maritime points; but that they did not intend to bring those topics before the conferences at all, unless the impressment of seamen was to be discussed on the part of Great Britain.

It was agreed that the next conference should take place on September 4th.

No. 3.

Protocol of the third conference held between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, at Whitehall, on the 17th day of September, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The conference fixed for the 4th instant having been adjourned by mutual consent, it was held this day.

The protocol of the preceding conference was agreed upon and signed.

The American Plenipotentiaries, after some previous explanation of the nature of the propositions which they were about to make, submitted the five annexed articles, (A, B, C, and D,) upon the fisheries, the boundary line, the West India intercourse, that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the captured slaves. The two first articles they stated to be drawn as permanent; and they accompanied that respecting the fisheries with the annexed explanatory memorandum. (E.)

The British Plenipotentiaries submitted the annexed projet of articles respecting the impressment of seamen, (F.); and they expressed their conviction that a consideration of these articles would, under all the circumstances of difficulty with which the question is involved, satisfy the American Plenipotentiaries of the sincere and earnest disposition of the British Government to go to every practicable length in a joint effort to remove all existing causes of difference, and to connect the two countries in the firmest ties of harmony and good understanding.

The American Plenipotentiaries declared that they received the proposition entirely in the same spirit; and then brought forward the annexed articles, (G,) relating to other maritime points, which, at the former conference, they had announced their intention of producing.

They also submitted three other articles, as annexed, respecting wrecks, &c. (H.)

It was agreed to meet on Friday, the 25th instant.

ARTICLE A.

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America: It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested, forever, the liberty to take fish, of every kind, on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Ramea islands, and the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to Quirpon Island, on the Magdalen islands; and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belleisle, and thence, northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland here above described, of the Magdalen islands, and of Labrador, as here above described; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground; and the United States hereby renounce any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays and harbors for the purpose only of obtaining shelter, wood, water, and bait, but under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their drying or curing fish therein, or in any other manner abusing the privilege hereby reserved to them.

ARTICLE B.

It is agreed that a line drawn due north or south, as the case may require, from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, until it shall intersect the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, and with the said parallel, shall be the line of demarcation between the territories of the United States and those of His Britannic Majesty to the westward of the said lake; and that the said line shall form the northern boundary of the said territories of the United States, and the southern boundary of His Britannic Majesty's said territories, from the said lake to the Pacific ocean; it being, however, distinctly understood that, with respect to the territories situated on the northwest coast of America, or westward of the Stony mountains, the two high contracting parties intend hereby to define the extent of their respective claims so far only as relates to the two parties, and without reference to the claims of any other nation.

The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers, on the northwest coast of America, as belong to or may be in the possession of either of the two high contracting parties, and shall be admitted and treated, with respect to their said ships and cargoes, and to trade generally, on the same terms and in the same manner as the inhabitants, vessels, and cargoes of the country owning or having possession of such places, ports, or rivers. The navigation of the rivers that fall into the Pacific ocean, and which may be intersected by the line of demarcation aforesaid, shall, from the sources of such branches as may be thus intersected, to the ocean, remain free and open to the citizens of the United States and to the subjects of Great Britain. But both parties reserve to themselves the power of regulating, each within their respective territories, the right to the navigation of the rivers that fall into the Gulf of Mexico or into Hudson's Bay.

ARTICLE C.

It is agreed that vessels of the United States shall have liberty to import from any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, into any of the following ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies, and on the continent of South America, viz: the ports of Kingston, Savannah La Mar, Montego bay, Santa Lucia, Antonio, Saint Anne, Falmouth, and Porto Maria, in the island of Jamaica; the port of San Joseph, in the island of Trinidad; the port of Scarborough, in the island of Tobago; the port of St. George, in the island of Granada; the port of Kingston, in the island of St. Vincent; the port of Bridgetown, in the island of Barbadoes; the principal port in the island of St. Lucia; the port of Roseau, in the island of Dominica; the port of St. John's, in the island of Antigua; the port of Basseterre, in the island of St. Christopher's; the port of Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola; the principal port of Turk's Island; the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence; the port of Pittstown, in Crooked Island; the principal port of the island of Bermuda; the principal port in the colony of Demarara, and the principal port in the colony of Berbice, tobacco, naval stores, live stock, and every species of provisions and lumber, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to import in the same manner every other article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which into the above-mentioned British islands and colonies shall not be entirely prohibited from every other place whatever, if of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and from every other foreign country or place, if of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country or place. The said vessels coming directly from any of the aforesaid ports of the United States shall likewise have liberty to export from any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions to any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, sugar, coffee, molasses, and salt, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the above-mentioned British islands and colonies; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to export, in the same manner, any other article of the said growth, produce, or manufacture, the exportation of which from the said British islands and colonies to every other foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, however, That the quantity of sugar and coffee which may be thus exported shall not, for each vessel, exceed the rate of five hundred weight of both together for each ton of the burden of such vessel.

British vessels shall in the same manner, have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, into any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, sugar, coffee, molasses, and salt, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the above-mentioned British islands and colonies; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to import, in the same manner, any other article of the said growth, produce, or manufacture, the exportation of which from the said islands and colonies to the United States shall be allowed in vessels of the United States, and the importation of which into the said United States from every foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, however, That the quantity of sugar and coffee which may be thus imported shall not exceed, for each vessel, the rate of five hundred weight of both together, for each ton of the burden of such vessel. The said vessels, coming directly from any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, shall likewise have liberty to export, from any of the aforesaid ports of the United States to any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, tobacco, naval stores, live stock, and every species of provisions and lumber, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to export, in the same manner, every other article, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which into the said British ports from the said United States shall be allowed in vessels of the United States, and the exportation of which from the said United States to every foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited.

The vessels of either of the two parties employed in the trade provided for by this article shall be admitted in the ports of the other party, as above mentioned, without paying any other or higher duties or charges than those payable in the same ports by the vessels of such other party; and they shall have liberty, respectively, to touch, during the same voyage, at one or more of the ports above mentioned of the other party, for the purpose of disposing of their inward, or of taking on board their outward cargoes.

No other or higher duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any of the articles which may be imported therein by virtue of this article, when imported in British vessels, than when imported in vessels of the United States; nor when imported directly from the above-mentioned ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, than when imported in a circuitous manner. And no other or higher duties shall be paid on the importation into the above-mentioned ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, of any of the articles which may be imported therein by virtue of this article, when imported in vessels of the United States, than when imported in British vessels, nor when imported directly from the United States, than when imported in a circuitous manner.

The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties shall be allowed on the exportation of any articles which may, by virtue of this article, be exported either from the above-mentioned British islands and colonies to the United States, or from the said United States to the said islands and colonies, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels. And the articles thus exported shall, in the dominions of both parties, respectively, pay the same duties, and be allowed the same bounties on the exportation thereof, as when exported to any other foreign country or place whatever.

ARTICLE. British vessels shall have liberty to export from any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, to the ports of Halifax, in His Britannic Majesty's province of Nova Scotia; to the port of St. John's, in His Britannic Majesty's province of New Brunswick; and to any other port within the said provinces of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, to which vessels of any other foreign nation shall be admitted, any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which from the said United States into His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies and on the continent of South America shall be allowed in vessels of the United States, by virtue of the next preceding article of this treaty, and the exportation of which from the United States to every other foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited; and vessels of the United States shall, in like manner, have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, into any of the aforesaid ports within the said provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, any of the articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said United States, the exportation of which from the said United States to the said provinces shall be allowed in British vessels, and the importation of which into the said provinces from every other foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited.

British vessels shall also have liberty to import from any of the said ports within the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, into any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, gypsum and grindstones the produce or manufacture of the said provinces; and they shall likewise have liberty to import in the same manner any other article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said provinces, the exportation of which from the said provinces to the United States shall be allowed in vessels of the United States, and the importation of which into the said United States from every other foreign country shall not be altogether prohibited. And vessels of the United States shall have liberty to export from the said provinces to the said United States gypsum and grindstones, the produce or manufacture of the said provinces; and they shall likewise have liberty to export, in the same manner, any other article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said provinces, the exportation of which to every other foreign country shall not be entirely prohibited.

The vessels of either of the two parties employed in the trade provided for by this article shall be admitted in the ports of the other party, as above mentioned, without paying any other or higher duties or charges than those payable in the same ports by the vessels of such other party. The same duties shall also be paid, respectively, in the dominions of both parties on the importation and on the exportation of the articles which may be imported or exported by virtue of this article, and the same bounties shall also be allowed on the exportation thereof, whether such importation or exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

ARTICLE D.

Whereas complaints have been made by divers inhabitants of the United States, that several slaves, their private property, were carried away from the United States, contrary to the intentions of the first article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded at Ghent, between the two high contracting parties, on the twenty-fourth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, it is agreed that full compensation shall be made by the British Government to the said complainants for all slaves, their private property, who, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, were in any territories, places, or possessions, whatsoever, directed by the said treaty to be restored to the United States, but then still occupied by the British forces, and who were afterwards removed or carried away by the said forces, whether such slaves as aforesaid were, at the date aforesaid, on shore or on board any vessels lying in waters which, being within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, were to be restored to them. And, for the purpose of truly ascertaining the number and value of the said slaves, three commissioners shall be appointed, and authorized to meet and act in manner following, that is to say: one shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and one by His Britannic Majesty; and the said two commissioners shall agree on the choice of a third; or, if they cannot so agree, they shall each propose one person; and, of the two names so proposed, one shall be drawn by lot, in the presence of the two original commissioners. The three commissioners thus appointed shall first meet in the City of Washington, but shall have power to adjourn from place to place, as they shall see cause. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, and, before proceeding to act, shall, respectively, take the following oath or affirmation, in the presence of each other; which oath or affirmation, being duly taken and attested, shall be entered on the record of their proceedings; that is to say: "I, A. B., one of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the — article of the treaty of —, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, do solemnly swear [or affirm] that I will diligently, impartially, and carefully examine, and, to the best of my judgment, according to justice and equity, decide all such complaints or applications as, under the said article, shall be preferred to the said commissioners." Two of the said commissioners shall constitute a board, provided they be those named by the respective Governments; and vacancies, caused by death or otherwise, shall be filled up in the manner of the original appointments; and the new commissioners shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties. Twelve months, from the day on which the said commissioners shall form a board, are assigned for receiving complaints and applications; but they are, nevertheless, authorized, in any particular cases in which it shall appear to them reasonable and just, to extend the said term for any term not exceeding six months after the expiration thereof. In examining the complaints and applications preferred to them by the owners of slaves, or their lawful attorneys or representatives, the said commissioners are empowered and required, in pursuance of the true intent and meaning of this article, to examine, on oath or affirmation, all such persons as shall come before them, touching the real number and value of the slaves alleged to have been carried away as aforesaid; and also to receive in evidence, according as they may think consistent with equity and justice, written depositions, being duly authenticated, either according to existing legal forms, or in such other manner as the said commissioners shall see cause to require or allow.

The award of the said commissioners, or any two of them, shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, whether as to the number, the value, or the ownership of the slaves carried away as aforesaid. And His Britannic Majesty undertakes to cause the sum awarded to each and every owner, in lieu of his slave or slaves, as above described, to be paid, without deduction, at such time or times, and at such place or places, as shall be awarded by the said commissioners, and on condition of such releases being given as they shall direct: Provided, That no such payments shall be fixed to take place sooner than twelve months from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty. It is further agreed that the said commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties; such agreement to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty. And all other expenses attending the execution of the commission shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the majority of the commissioners.

Explanatory Memorandum.

The American Plenipotentiaries presented for consideration an article on the subject of certain fisheries. They stated, at the same time, that, as the United States considered the liberty of taking, drying, and curing fish, secured to them by the treaty of peace of 1783, as being unimpaired, and still in force for the whole extent of the fisheries in question, whilst Great Britain considered that liberty as having been abrogated by war; and as, by the article now proposed, the United States offered to desist from their claim to a certain portion of the said fisheries, that offer was made with the understanding that the article now proposed, or any other on the same subject which might be agreed on, should be considered as permanent, and, like one for fixing boundaries between the territories of the two parties, not to be abrogated by the mere fact of a war between them; or that, if vacated by any event whatever, the rights of both parties should revive and be in full force, as if such an article had not been agreed to.

F.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., &c., and the President of the United States of America, being animated with an equal desire to remove, by amicable regulations, the inconveniences which have arisen from the difficulty of discriminating between the subjects of the two Powers, respectively, have determined to proceed, without prejudice to the rights of either Power, to frame such conventional arrangements as may obviate the evils which might hereafter again result from the circumstances above stated to the public service, the commerce, or subjects of either of the contracting parties. In pursuance of so desirable an object, his said Majesty and the President of the United States have nominated Plenipotentiaries to discuss and sign a treaty to this effect.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has nominated the Right Honorable Frederick John Robinson, &c., &c., and Henry Goulburn, Esq., &c., &c.; and the President of the United States has nominated Albert Gallatin, Esq., &c., &c., and Richard Rush, Esq., who, having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ART. 1. The high contracting parties engage and bind themselves to adopt without delay, and in the manner that may best correspond with their respective laws, such measures as may be most effectual for excluding the natural born subjects of either party from serving in the public or private marine of the other: Provided, always, That nothing contained in this article shall be understood to apply to such natural born subjects of either Power as may have been naturalized by their respective laws previous to the signature of the present treaty; and such measures, when adopted, shall be immediately communicated to each party, respectively.

ART. 2. For the better ascertaining the number of persons on either side that may fall within the exception contained in the preceding article, the high contracting parties engage to deliver, each to the other, within twelve months from the ratification of the present treaty, a list of all persons falling within the said exception, specifying the places of their birth, with the date of their becoming naturalized. And it is further agreed that none other than the persons whose names shall be included in the said lists shall be deemed to fall within the said exception.

ART. 3. The high contracting parties, however, reserve to themselves the power to authorize and permit, by proclamation, their respective subjects or citizens to serve in the public or private marine of the other country. And it is hereby expressly understood that, so long as such permission shall remain in force, it shall be competent for the Government of the other Power, notwithstanding the engagement set forth in the first article of this treaty, to admit the performance of the said service; Provided, always, That whenever the Power granting permission to the said subjects or citizens to serve in the marine of the other shall withdraw the same, notification thereof shall forthwith be made to the other contracting party; and, on receipt of such notification, the Power receiving the same shall forthwith notify it in the most public and official manner, and shall use its utmost endeavors to restrain the said subjects of the other party from further serving in its public or private marine, and shall enforce the exclusion of the said subjects of the other Power as may then be in its service, as if no such permission had been promulgated.

ART. 5. In consideration of the stipulations contained in the preceding articles, it is agreed by the high contracting parties that, during the continuance of the present treaty, neither Power shall impress or forcibly withdraw, cause to be impressed, or forcibly withdrawn, any person or persons from the vessels of the other Power, when met upon the high seas, on any plea or pretext whatsoever; Provided always, That nothing contained in this article shall be construed to apply to the vessels of either Power which may be within the ports or within the maritime jurisdiction of the other: And, also, provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or effect the established right of search as authorized in time of war by the law of nations.

ART. 6. The high contracting parties have agreed to extend the duration of the present treaty to ten years; and they reserve to themselves to concert as to its renewal at such convenient period, previous to its expiration, as may insure to their respective subjects the uninterrupted benefit which they expect from its provisions: Provided, always, That either Power may, if it deem it expedient, upon giving six months' previous notice to the other, wholly abrogate and annul the present treaty.

ART. 6. It is agreed that nothing contained in the preceding articles shall be understood to affect the rights and principles on which the high contracting parties have heretofore acted in respect to any of the matters to which these stipulations refer, except so far as the same shall have been modified, restrained, or suspended by the said articles. And whenever the present treaty shall cease to be in operation, either by the expiration of the term for which it is enacted, without any renewal of the same, or by the abrogation thereof by either of the contracting parties, as hereinbefore provided, or (which God forbid) by any war between the high contracting parties, each of the said high contracting parties shall stand, with respect to the other, as to its said rights and principles, as if no such treaty had ever been made.

G.

(a) Whenever one of the high contracting parties shall be at war, any vessel of the other party sailing for a port or place belonging to an enemy of the first party, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, may be turned away from such port or place; but she shall not be detained, nor her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after such notice, she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she may think proper. No vessel or cargo shall be condemned for breach of a blockade, unless captured by one of the blockading ships, or unless she shall attempt to enter after notice as aforesaid. Nor shall any vessel or goods of either party, that may have entered into such port or place before the same was besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, and be found therein after the reduction or surrender of such place, be liable to confiscation, but shall be restored to the owners or proprietors thereof. And, in order to determine what characterizes a blockade, it is agreed that that denomination shall apply to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power which blockades it, with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering.

(b.) Whereas differences have heretofore arisen concerning the trading with the colonies of His Britannic Majesty's enemies, and the instructions given by His Majesty to his cruisers in regard thereto, it is agreed that, whenever His Britannic Majesty shall be at war, all articles, not being contraband of war, may be freely carried from the ports of the United States to the ports of any colony not blockaded belonging to His Majesty's enemies: Provided, Such goods as are not of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, shall previously have been entered and landed in the United States, and the ordinary duties on such articles, so imported for home consumption, shall have been paid, or secured to be paid; and the said goods, on re-exportation, shall, after the drawback, remain subject to a duty equivalent to not less than one per cent. ad valorem; and that the said goods, and the vessels conveying the same, shall, from the time of their clearance from the port of the United States, be bona fide the sole property of citizens of the United States; and, in like manner, that all articles not being contraband of war, and being the growth or produce of the colonies of His Britannic Majesty's enemies, may be brought to the United States, and, after having been there landed, may be freely carried from thence to any foreign port not blockaded: Provided, Such goods shall previously have been entered and landed in the United States, and the ordinary duties on colonial articles, so imported for home consumption, shall have been paid or secured to be paid; and that the said goods, except only mahogany and fustic, shall, on re-exportation, after the drawback, remain subject to a duty equivalent to not less than two per cent. ad valorem: And provided, That the said goods, and the vessels conveying the same, be bona fide the sole property of citizens of the United States: Provided always, That this article, or anything contained therein, shall not affect any question now or hereafter judicially pending, touching the legality or illegality of a direct trade from Europe, or other foreign countries, by citizens of the United States, with the colonies or possessions of His Britannic Majesty's enemies beyond the Cape of Good Hope, nor operate to the prejudice of any right belonging to either party; but that, after the expiration of the time limited for this treaty, the rights on both sides shall revive and be in full force.

(c.) In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed that under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or by sea, such as cannon, mortars, muskets, pistols, and other fire arms, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, saucisses, rockets, carriages for cannon, firelocks, musket rests, bandoliers, gunpowder, saltpetre, sulphur, matches, balls, and bullets, helmets or head-pieces, cuirasses, swords, pikes, halberts, lances, javelins, saddles, bridles, and other horse furniture, holsters, pouches, belts, and generally all other implements of war, excepting, however, the quantity of the said articles which may be necessary for the defence of the ship, and of those who compose the crew; but all such articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy. But no vessel shall be detained on pretence of carrying contraband of war, unless some of the above-mentioned articles are found on board of the said vessel at the time it is searched.

(d.) In all cases where one of the high contracting parties shall be at war, the armed vessels belonging to such party shall not station themselves, nor rove or hover, nor stop, search, or disturb the vessels of the other party, or the unarmed vessels of other nations, within the chambers formed by head-lands, or within five marine miles from the shore belonging to the other party, or from a right line from one head-land to another.

(e.) Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be at war, and where vessels of the other party shall be captured or detained by the ships of war or privateers of the belligerent for any lawful cause, the said vessels shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port, and such part only of the articles on board as are subject to condemnation by the law of nations shall be made prize; and the vessels, unless by that law also subject to condemnation, shall be at liberty to proceed with the remainder of the cargo without any impediment.

In all cases of unfounded detention, or other contravention of the regulations stipulated by the present treaty, the owners of the vessel and cargo so detained shall be allowed damages proportioned to the loss occasioned thereby, together with the costs and charges of the trial. All proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay in deciding the cases of ships or cargoes so brought in for adjudication, and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be paid to the owners of such ships or cargoes. And whenever sentence shall be pronounced against any vessel thus captured or detained, or against her cargo, or part thereof, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded; and a duly authenticated copy of all the proceedings in the cause, and of the said sentence, shall, if required, be delivered, without the smallest delay, to the commander of the said vessel, or to the owner thereof, or to the agent of either, on the payment of all legal fees and demands for the same.

The commanders of ships of war and privateers of the belligerent party, shall, in searching of merchant ships of the other party, conduct themselves according to the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations, and as favorably, moreover, as towards the most friendly Power that may remain neuter. The said commanders, their officers and crews, shall forbear doing any damage to the subjects or citizens of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary, they shall be punished, and shall also be bound, in their persons and estates, to make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damages may be.

For this cause, all commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, shall be compelled to give, before a competent judge, sufficient security, by at least two responsible sureties, who have no interest in the said privateer, each of whom, together with the said commander, shall be jointly and severally bound in the sum of two thousand two hundred and fifty pounds sterling, or of ten thousand dollars; or, if such ship be provided with above one hundred and fifty seamen or soldiers, in the sum of four thousand five hundred pounds sterling, or of twenty thousand dollars, to satisfy all damages and injuries which the said privateers, or officers or men, or any of them, may do or commit during their cruise, contrary to the tenor of this treaty, or to the laws and instructions for regulating their conduct; and further, that, in all cases of unlawful aggressions, the said commissions shall be revoked and annulled.

(f.) The ships of war and privateers of the two nations, as well as their prizes, shall be treated, in their respective ports, as those of the most favored nation.

It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, who have commissions from any Power or State at war with either of the two nations, to arm their ships in the ports of either of the said parties, nor to sell what they have taken, nor in any manner to exchange the same; nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that Power or State from whom they obtained their commissions.

(g.) It is likewise agreed that the subjects of the two nations shall not do any acts of hostility or violence against each other, nor accept commissions so to act from any foreign Power or State, enemies to the other party; nor shall the enemies of one of the parties be permitted to invite, or endeavor to enlist in the military service, any of the subjects or citizens of the other party.

Relations with Great Britain.

The laws against all such offences and aggressions shall be punctually executed; and if any subject or citizen of the said parties, respectively, shall accept any foreign commission or letters of marque for arming any vessel to act as a privateer against the other party, it is hereby declared to be lawful for the said party to treat and punish the said subject or citizen having such commission or letter of marque as a pirate.

H.

(A.) In the event of a shipwreck happening in a place belonging to either of the high contracting parties, not only every assistance shall be given to the unfortunate persons, and no violence done to them, but also the effects belonging to them, and which may be saved either from on board the ship, or in any other manner whatever, shall not be concealed, nor detained, under any pretext whatever. On the contrary, the above-mentioned effects and merchandise shall be preserved and restored to them, upon a suitable recompense being given to those who shall have assisted in saving their persons, vessels, or effects.

(i.) It is expressly stipulated that neither of the said contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal against the other, on complaints of injuries and damages, until the said party shall first have presented to the other a statement thereof, verified by competent proof and evidence, and demanded justice and satisfaction, the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

(k.) If at any time a rupture should take place (which God forbid) between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, neither the vessels and cargoes nor other property of any kind, belonging to the individuals of each of the two nations, which may at the time be in the harbors, or ports, or dominions of the other party, nor the debts due from individuals of one of the two nations to individuals of the other, nor shares or moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall be sequestered or confiscated. And the merchants and others of each of the two nations, residing in the dominions of the other, shall in no case be detained as prisoners of war, but they shall be permitted to remove, with their families, effects, and property; each Government having, nevertheless, the right, during their remaining in its dominions, to make such regulation and to take such precautions as it may deem necessary with respect to such persons.

Protocol of the fourth conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on Friday, the 25th of September, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

Explanations were asked, and given respecting some of the articles presented by the American Plenipotentiaries at the last conference.

The American Plenipotentiaries, after observing that the measures already adopted, and the proposals formerly made, by the United States, could leave no doubt of their constant and anxious desire to arrange, by amicable regulations, the subject of impressment, declared their readiness to agree, with some amendments, which they submitted, (A.) to the projet proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, under a full expectation that an arrangement, thus founded on mutual confidence, could not fail to have a happy effect, both as regarding its immediate object, and in confirming the amicable relations so happily subsisting between the two countries.

It was agreed to meet again on Tuesday, the 6th of October.

RICHARD RUSH,
FRED. JOHN ROBINSON,

Relations with Great Britain.

Albert Gallatin, Esquire, &c., &c., and Richard Rush, Esquire, who, having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties engage and bind themselves to adopt, without delay, and in the manner that may best correspond with their respective laws, such measures as may be most effectual for excluding [the natural born subjects of either party from serving in the public or private marine of the other:] Provided, always, That nothing contained in this article shall be understood to apply to such natural born subjects<sup>2</sup> of either Power as [may]<sup>3</sup> have been naturalized<sup>4</sup> by [their] respective laws<sup>5</sup> previous to the [signature] of the present treaty. And such measures, when adopted, shall be immediately communicated to each party, respectively.

ARTICLE 3.

The high contracting parties, however, reserve to themselves the power to authorize and permit,<sup>1</sup> by proclamation,<sup>2</sup> their respective subjects or citizens to serve in the public or private marine of the other country. And it is hereby expressly understood that, so long as such permission shall remain in force, it shall be competent for the Government of the other Power, notwithstanding the engagement set forth in the first article of this treaty, to admit the performance of the said service: Provided, always, That, whenever the Power so granting permission to the said subjects or citizens to serve in the marine of the other shall withdraw the same, notification thereof shall forthwith be made to the other contracting party; and, on receipt of such notification, the Power receiving the same shall forthwith notify it in the most public and official manner, and shall use its utmost endeavors to restrain the said subjects<sup>3</sup> of the other party from further serving in its public or private marine, and shall enforce the exclusion of such of the said subjects<sup>4</sup> of the other Power as may then be in its service,<sup>5</sup> as if no such permission had been promulgated.

ARTICLE 4.

[In consideration of the stipulations contained in the preceding articles,] it is agreed by the high contracting parties that, during the continuance of the present treaty, neither Power shall impress or forcibly withdraw, nor cause to be impressed or forcibly withdrawn, any person or persons from the vessels of the other Power, when met upon the high seas,<sup>2</sup> on any plea or pretext whatsoever: Provided, always, That nothing contained in this article shall be construed to apply to the vessels of either Power which may be within the ports or within the maritime jurisdiction of the other;] [And, also, provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or affect the established right of search, as authorized in time of war by the law of nations.]

ARTICLE 5.

The high contracting parties have agreed to extend the duration of the present treaty to ten years; and they reserve to themselves to concert as to its renewal, at such convenient period, previous to its expiration, as may insure to their respective subjects the uninterrupted benefit which they expect from its provisions; Provided, always, That either Power may, if it deem it expedient, upon giving six months' previous notice to the other, wholly abrogate and annul the present treaty.

ARTICLE 6.

It is agreed that nothing contained in the preceding articles shall be understood to affect the rights and principles of which the high contracting parties have heretofore acted in respect to any of the matters to which these stipulations refer,<sup>1</sup> except so far as the same shall have been modified, restrained, or suspended, by the said articles. And whenever the present treaty shall cease to be in operation, either by the expiration of the term for which it is enacted, without any renewal of the same, or by the abrogation thereof, by either of the contracting parties, as hereinbefore provided, or (which God forbid) by any war between the high contracting parties, each of the said high contracting parties shall stand, with respect to the other, as to its said rights and principles, as if no such treaty had ever been made.

No. 5.

Protocol of the fifth conference held between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, at Whitehall, on the 6th of October, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The protocol of the preceding conference was agreed upon and signed.

The British Plenipotentiaries gave in the five annexed articles on the fisheries, the boundary, the Mississippi, the intercourse between Nova Scotia and the United States, and the captured slaves. (A, B, C, D, E.)

It was agreed to meet again on the 9th instant.

ARTICLE A.

It is agreed that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish, of every kind, on that part of the western coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, and on that part of the southern and eastern coasts of Labrador which extends either of the two Powers, as acknowledged by the law of nations.

from Mount Joli to Huntingdon Island; and it is further agreed that the fishermen of the United States shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the said south and east coasts of Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but as soon as the same, or any part of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

And it is further agreed that nothing contained in this article shall be construed to give to the inhabitants of the United States any liberty to take fish within the rivers of His Britannic Majesty's territories, as above described; and it is agreed, on the part of the United States, that the fishermen of the United States resorting to the mouth of such rivers shall not obstruct the navigation thereof, nor wilfully injure nor destroy the fish within the same, either by setting nets across the mouths of such rivers, or by any other means whatever.

His Britannic Majesty further agrees that the vessels of the United States, bona fide engaged in such fishery, shall have liberty to enter the bays and harbors of any of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in North America, for the purpose of shelter, or of repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose; and all vessels so resorting to the said bays and harbors shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein.

It is further well understood that the liberty of taking, drying, and curing fish, granted in the preceding part of this article, shall not be construed to extend to any privilege of carrying on trade with any of His Britannic Majesty's subjects residing within the limits hereinbefore assigned for the use of the fishermen of the United States, for any of the purposes aforesaid.

And in order the more effectually to guard against smuggling, it shall not be lawful for the vessels of the United States, engaged in the said fishery, to have on board any goods, wares, or merchandise, whatever, except such as may be necessary for the prosecution of the fishery or the support of the fishermen whilst engaged therein, or in the prosecution of their voyages to and from the said fishing grounds. And any vessel of the United States which shall contravene this regulation may be seized, condemned, and confiscated, together with her cargo.

ARTICLE B.

It is agreed that a line drawn from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods along the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, or, if the said point shall not be in the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, then that a line drawn due north or south, as the case may be, until it shall intersect the said parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the line of demarcation between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States; and that the said line shall form the southern boundary of the said territories of His Britannic Majesty, and the northern boundary of the territories of the United States, from the said Lake of the Woods to the Stony mountains; and, in order to prevent any disputes as to the territorial rights of either of the contracting parties on the northwest coast of America, or anywhere to the westward of the Stony mountains, it is agreed that so much of the said country as lies between the forty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, shall be free and open to the subjects and citizens of the two States, respectively, for the purpose of trade and commerce; it being well understood that, although, by virtue of this arrangement, the two high contracting parties agree not to exercise as against each other any sovereign or territorial authority within the above-mentioned country lying between the forty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim to which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any territorial authority in any part of the country lying within the said limits; nor shall it be taken to affect the claim of any other Power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the two high contracting parties being to prevent disputes and differences between themselves.

ARTICLE C.

It is further agreed that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty shall have and enjoy the free navigation of the river Mississippi from its source to the ocean, and shall at all times have free access from such place as may be selected for that purpose, in His Britannic Majesty's territories, to the river Mississippi, with their goods, wares, and merchandise, the importation of which into the United States shall not be entirely prohibited, on the payment of the same duties as would be payable on the importation of the same article into the Atlantic ports of the United States.

ARTICLE D.

British vessels shall have liberty to export, from any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, to the ports of Halifax, in His Britannic Majesty's province of Nova Scotia; to the port of St. John's, in His Britannic Majesty's province of New Brunswick, and to any other port within the said provinces of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, to which vessels of any other foreign nation shall be admitted, the following articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, viz: scantling, planks, staves, heading-boards, shingles, hoops, horses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, or live stock of any sort, bread, biscuit, flour, peas, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, or grain of any sort, pitch, tar, turpentine, fruits, seeds, and tobacco.

And vessels of the United States shall, in like manner, have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports of the United States into any of the aforesaid ports within the said provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the above-mentioned articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States.

British vessels shall also have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports within the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, into any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, gypsum and grindstones, or any other articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said provinces, and, also, any produce or manufacture of any of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, the importation of which into the United States shall not be entirely prohibited.

And vessels of the United States shall have liberty to import from the said provinces to the said United States, slates, gypsum, and grindstones, or any other article, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any part of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, the importation of which into the United States from any other place shall not be entirely prohibited.

The vessels of either of the two parties employed in the trade provided for by this article shall be admitted in the ports of the other party, as above mentioned, without paying any other or higher duties or charges than those payable in the same ports by the vessels of such other party. The same duties shall also be paid, respectively, in the dominions of both parties, on the importation and on the exportation of the articles which may be imported or exported, by virtue of this article; and the same bounties shall also be allowed on the exportation thereof, whether such importation or exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

ARTICLE E.

Whereas it was agreed by the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, that "all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery, or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property;" and whereas doubts have arisen whether certain slaves, originally captured in certain forts and places belonging to the United States, and removed therefrom, but remaining within the territories of the United States, or on board the ships of His Britannic Majesty, lying within the harbors of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, are to extend under the above-recited provisions of the said treaty, the high contracting parties do hereby agree to refer the said doubts to some friendly Sovereign or State, to be named for that purpose; and the high contracting parties engage to consider the decision of such friendly Sovereign or State to be final and conclusive on all the matters so referred.

No. 6.

LONDON, October 7, 1818.

Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush present their compliments to Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn, and beg leave to send them the enclosed paper, containing some remarks on the articles handed to them at the conference yesterday. They are to be considered as unofficial, according to the intimation given yesterday, when they were promised, and have been drawn up merely under the hope that, by possessing the British Plenipotentiaries of some of the views of the American Plenipotentiaries before the next meeting on the 9th, the progress of the negotiation may be accelerated.

Fisheries.

The American Plenipotentiaries are not authorized by their instructions to assent to any article on that subject which shall not secure to the inhabitants of the United States the liberty of taking fish of every kind on the southern coast of Newfoundland, from Cape Ray to the Ramea islands, and on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belleisle, and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast: and, also, the liberty of drying and curing fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Labrador and of the southern coast of Newfoundland, as above described; with the proviso respecting such of the said bays, harbors, and creeks as may be settled.

The liberty of taking fish within rivers is not asked. A positive clause to except them is unnecessary, unless it be intended to comprehend under that name waters which might otherwise be considered as bays or creeks. Whatever extent of fishing-ground may be secured to American fishermen, the American Plenipotentiaries are not prepared to accept it on a tenure or on conditions different from those on which the whole has heretofore been held. Their instructions did not anticipate that any new terms of restrictions would be annexed, as none were suggested in the proposals made by Mr. Bagot to the American Government. The clauses forbidding the spreading of nets, and making vessels liable to confiscation in case any articles not wanted for carrying on the fishery should be found on board, are of that description, and would expose the fishermen to endless vexations.

Mississippi.

The American Plenipotentiaries are not authorized to agree to any condition that would bring the British in contact with the Mississippi. The right to the navigation of that river could only be derived from the treaty of 1783; and, if viewed as a matter of compromise, that right is much less valuable and important than the portion of the fisheries which the United States would lose by the agreement, even on the terms proposed by them.

Boundary.

That portion of the article which relates to the country west of the Stony mountains cannot be agreed to in its present shape. The American Plenipotentiaries cannot consent to throw in a common stock that part only of the country to which the United States deny the claim of Great Britain, and which lies within the same latitudes as their own territories east of the Stony mountains; thus, also, implying the exclusion of their citizens from the trade on the northwest coast of America, (north of 49°,) which they have enjoyed without interruption for a number of years, and as early as the British.

Nor are they authorized to agree to expressions implying a renunciation of territorial sovereignty, although perfectly disposed not to insist on an extension of the line of demarcation to that country. They will propose either that the whole of the article relating to that subject, and immediately following the words "to the Stony mountains," should be omitted, inserting, in lieu thereof, a proviso similar to what had on former occasions been agreed to, viz: "But nothing in the present article shall be construed to extend to the northwest coast of America, or to territories belonging to or claimed by either party on the continent of America westward of the Stony mountains;" or, that the proposed article should be amended in the manner stated in the enclosed copy.

Slaves.

The American Plenipotentiaries had hoped that this subject might have been arranged without a reference to a friendly Power. If this cannot be done, they will agree to the reference; observing, however, that a change in the phraseology will be necessary, so as to bring the whole claim before the foreign sovereign. They are also authorized to agree that the Emperor of Russia should, by the article, be designated as the umpire.

Protocol of the sixth conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on the 9th of October, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, and Mr. Robinson.

ARTICLE.

It is agreed that a line drawn from the most north-western point of the Lake of the Woods along the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, or, if the said point shall not be in the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, then that a line drawn<sup>1</sup> due north or south, as the case may be, until<sup>2</sup> [it] shall intersect the said parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the line of demarcation between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States; and that the said line shall form the southern boundary of the said territories of His Britannic Majesty, and the northern boundary of the territories of the United States, from the said Lake of the Woods to the Stony mountains;* and <sup>3</sup>in order to prevent any disputes as to the territorial rights of either of the contracting parties on the northwest coast of America, or anywhere to the westward of the Stony mountains, it is agreed that so much of the said country as lies between the forty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, shall be free and open to the subjects and citizens of the two <sup>4</sup>[States] respectively, for the purpose of trade and commerce, it being well understood that <sup>5</sup>although, by virtue of this arrangement, the two high contracting parties agree not to exercise, as against each other, any other sovereign or territorial authority within the above-mentioned country, lying between the forty-fifth and forty-ninth parallels of latitude] this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any territorial authority in any part of the country, <sup>6</sup>[lying within the said limits,] nor shall it be taken to affect the claim of any other Power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the two

The American Plenipotentiaries declared that they could not agree to the article upon the fisheries brought forward by the British Plenipotentiaries at the preceding conference, nor to that respecting the navigation of the Mississippi, nor to any article that would bring the British in contact with that river.

They also stated that they could not take into consideration the article respecting the intercourse with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, unconnected with the subject of the British West Indies.

They presented several amendments (A, B) to the articles respecting the boundary line and slaves carried away, proposed at the last conference by the British Plenipotentiaries.

It was agreed to meet again on Tuesday, the 13th instant.

No. 8.

OCTOBER 12, 1818.

Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush present their compliments to Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn, and beg leave to state that, on full consideration, since the meeting on Friday, they do not feel themselves authorized to consent to the condition annexed to the second article of the project on impressment, which declares that "none other than the persons whose names shall be included in the said lists shall be deemed to fall within the said exception." Their reasons are stated in the enclosed unofficial memorandum.

Mr. G. and Mr. R. give this notice of their disagreement previous to the meeting fixed for tomorrow, in the hope that, if the alteration which they have heretofore proposed should not, contrary to their expectations, be found acceptable, some other amendment or modification may suggest itself to the British Plenipotentiaries, rather than that the arrangement should fall through.

MEMORANDUM.

Lists of seamen naturalized.

It is required by the British Plenipotentiaries that persons whose names shall not appear on the lists of naturalized seamen, to be mutually furnished by the two Governments, shall not be considered as falling within the exception contemplated by the agreement; that is to say, that such persons, although naturalized, shall, re-

B.

<sup>1</sup> under the aforesaid article, the United States claim for their citizens, and as their private property, the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves, who, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, were in any territory, places, or possessions whatsoever, directed by the said treaty to be restored to the United States, but then still occupied by the British forces, who were afterwards removed or carried away by the said forces, whether such slaves were, at the date aforesaid, on shore, or on board any British vessels lying in waters within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States: and whereas differences have arisen whether, by the true intent and meaning of the aforesaid article of the Treaty of Ghent, the United States are entitled to the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves as above described, spectively, be excluded from the public or private marine of either party.

But it is impracticable for the Government of the United States to procure complete lists of naturalized seamen, for the following reasons:

Prior to the year 1790, aliens might be naturalized according to the laws of the several States; and it is known that, in some of them, (Pennsylvania for instance,) the naturalization took place before justices of the peace. In these cases, and also when the records of a court may have been destroyed, it would be found difficult, if not impossible, to obtain any other evidence of the naturalization than the certificate given at the time to the naturalized person.

Since the year 1790, although the term of previous residence has varied, the mode has been uniform. Aliens have been naturalized only in conformity with the laws of the United States, and before such courts of record as were designated by those laws. But that designation embraced not only the courts of the United States, properly so called, but also the courts of the several States, including even those of a subordinate jurisdiction, amounting, together, to several hundred. It is necessary to add, that minor children of naturalized persons, if dwelling in the United States, become, also, by virtue of their father's naturalization, ipso facto, naturalized themselves.

Relations with Great Britain.

If an attempt is made to compile the lists required from the records of the several courts, a first and leading objection is, that the courts of the several States, not being bound to obey in that respect the orders of the General Government, it will be optional with them whether the clerks shall abstract from the records of thirty years those of the naturalization of aliens which are interspersed among them, and transmit those abstracts to the Government of the United States.

But, supposing that every one of those courts should comply with the order, the lists must contain the names of all the British natural born subjects, (and for the year 1790 to 1795, during which time no discrimination of birthplace was recorded, of all aliens,) who have been naturalized for a period of thirty years, without pointing out those who were seamen; no specification of the profession or calling of the parties ever having been required by law to be entered on the records. And those lists, although containing the names of many thousand persons, not seamen, would be defective, by the total omission of the names of the minor children above mentioned, their names not having been directed, by law, to make a part of the record, and the burden of the proof of their citizenship resting with themselves.

There is but one other source of information from which the lists required might be partially obtained.

The collectors of the customs have been required, by a law passed in 1796, to keep books, in which the names of seamen, citizens of the United States, should, on their application, be entered. It is known that this law was never fully complied with, and that the returns are defective. But, even in the cases where the collectors have complied with it, the registers must necessarily be incomplete, since no names were entered but on the application of the parties; besides which, the names of the native citizens were not, by the law, directed to be distinguished from those of naturalized persons.

From this statement of facts, it follows that, although partial lists may be compiled, which will contain the names of many naturalized British seamen, those lists will still be very imperfect. If the condition now urged was complied with, the consequence would be that aliens, naturalized prior to the treaty, who have become citizens of the United States on the faith of a public law, and are thereby entitled to every political and civil right enjoyed by native citizens, (that of becoming President or Vice President of the United States only excepted,) would, by a retrospective, and therefore unconstitutional act, be deprived not of a privilege merely political, but of the right of exercising the only profession they have for the support of themselves and their families. And minors, too, who have never known any other country but America, would be precluded from following the seas when they came to a proper age.

The American Plenipotentiaries cannot assent to a condition involving such results. They are expressly bound by their instructions, whilst admitting, as a general principle, that neither Government shall employ, in its public or private marine, the natural born subjects or citizens of the other country, to except from its operation all those who shall have been naturalized prior to the treaty. That exception has been mutually assumed as one of the foundations of the agreement; and the effect of the condition alluded to would necessarily be that a portion only of the persons thus previously naturalized in the United States would be embraced by the exception.

The American Plenipotentiaries beg leave to add that the condition appears to them unnecessary. According to that which they propose, every British natural-born subject, not included in the lists, and claiming to be employed as a seaman on board an American vessel, must adduce proofs of his having been naturalized prior to the exchange of ratifications. He must produce either the original certificate of his naturalization, or an authentic copy, attested as such by the proper court. If claiming as a minor, by virtue of his father's naturalization, he must, in addition, produce legal proofs of the fact. In the cases for which the condition is intended to provide, proofs may always be given similar to those which, in every case, would be admitted as conclusive by the laws of Great Britain, as well as by those of the United States.

Finally, the right reserved to either party of annulling the agreement at will, affords security in this case as well as in all others. This reservation, which had not been contemplated by the Government of the United States, has been acceded to by their Plenipotentiaries, in order to remove every objection to the arrangement, and to avoid the necessity of entering into details respecting the measures necessary to carry it into effect. Great Britain being thereby effectually secured against every risk, and holding in her own hands a complete remedy against deviations from the terms of the compact in all cases, no necessity appears to exist for an additional security on this particular point.

No. 9.

Protocol of the seventh conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on the 13th of October, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The British Plenipotentiaries acquiesced in the amendment proposed at the preceding conference by the American Plenipotentiaries, in the article respecting captured slaves, except as far as related to the insertion in the article of the name of any particular Power.

They brought forward new articles (A, B, C, D, E) respecting the fisheries, the boundary, impressment, and maritime points, and accompanied the articles D with the annexed memorandum E. They agreed to the omission of the article respecting the Mississippi.

It was agreed to meet again on Monday, the 19th instant.

ALBERT GALLATIN,
RICHARD RUSH,
FRED. J. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN.

ARTICLE A.

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America: It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland, which extends from Cape Ray to the Ramea islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon islands, on the shores of the Magdalen islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belleisle, and thence, northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

ARTICLE B.

It is agreed that a line drawn from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, or, if the said point shall not be in the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, then, that a line drawn from the said point due north or south, as the case may be, until the said line shall intersect the said parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the line of demarcation between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States; and that the said line shall form the southern boundary of the said territories of His Britannic Majesty and the northern boundary of the territories of the United States, from the Lake of the Woods to the Stony mountains. But nothing in the preceding part of this article shall be construed to extend to the northwestern coast of America, or to territories belonging to, or claimed by, either party, on the continent of America westward of the Stony mountains; and any such country as may be claimed by either party westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open to the vessels, subjects, or citizens of the two Powers, respectively, for the purposes of trade and commerce. It being well understood that nothing contained in this article shall be taken to affect the claims of any other Power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the two high contracting parties being to prevent disputes and differences between themselves.

ARTICLE C.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, &c., and the United States of America, animated with an equal desire to prevent, by conventional regulations, the recurrence of inconveniences which have heretofore arisen from the employment of the natural born subjects of His Britannic Majesty in the public or private marine of the United States, and from the employment of the natural born citizens of the United States in the public or private marine of His Britannic Majesty, have nominated Plenipotentiaries to negotiate a convention for this desirable object.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., has nominated the right honorable Frederick John Robinson, &c., and Henry Goulburn, Esq., &c., and the President of the United States has nominated Albert Gallatin, Esq., and Richard Rush, Esq., &c., who, having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and signed the following articles:

1. The high contracting parties engage and bind themselves to adopt, respectively, without delay, the most effectual measures for excluding, respectively, from serving either in their public or private marine, the natural born subjects and the natural born citizens of the other party; that is to say: His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for excluding the natural born citizens of the United States from serving either in the public or private marine of his dominions; and the United States, for excluding the natural born subjects of His Britannic Majesty from serving either in the public or private marine of the United States; and such measures, when adopted, shall be immediately communicated by each party to the other: Provided always, That nothing contained in this article shall be understood to apply to any seamen, being natural born subjects of His Britannic Majesty, or natural born citizens of the United States, who have been naturalized by the respective laws of either Power previous to the signature of the present convention.

2. The high contracting parties engage to deliver, each to the other, within eighteen months from the ratification of the present convention, a list, as far as it may be found practicable to obtain it, containing the names and description of the seamen falling within the said exception, specifying the places of their birth, and the date of their becoming naturalized. And it is further agreed that no person, whose name shall not be included in the said lists, shall be deemed to fall within the said exceptions.

3. It is however agreed that, if one of the high contracting parties shall, at any time during the continuance of this convention, think fit to notify to the other that it does not insist upon the exclusion of its natural born subjects, or natural born citizens, from the public or private marine of the other party, it shall be competent to the said other party, notwithstanding the engagement set forth in the first article of this convention, no longer to exclude the said subjects or citizens: Provided always, That, whenever the Power which has made the said notification shall recall the same, its recall shall be immediately communicated to the other contracting party; and, on receipt of such communication, the Power receiving the same shall forthwith make it known, in the most public and official manner, and shall use its utmost endeavors to restrain the said subjects or citizens of the other party from further serving in its public or private marine, and shall enforce the exclusion of such of the said subjects or citizens of the other Power as may then be in its service, as if no such stipulations as are contained in the preceding part of this article had been agreed to.

4. It is agreed by the high contracting parties, that, during the continuance of the present convention, neither Power shall impress or forcibly withdraw, or cause to be impressed or forcibly withdrawn, any person or persons from the vessels of the other party, when met upon the high seas, or upon the narrow seas, on any plea or pretext whatsoever: Provided always, That nothing contained in this article shall be construed to impair or affect the rights of either Power to impress or forcibly withdraw, or cause to be impressed or forcibly withdrawn, its natural born subjects or natural born citizens, not falling within the exceptions mentioned in the preceding articles, from any vessel being within its ports, or within its ordinary maritime jurisdiction, as acknowledged by the law of nations: And also provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or affect the established right of search, as authorized in time of war by the law of nations.

5. The high contracting parties have agreed to extend the duration of the present treaty to ten years, and they reserve to themselves to concert as to its renewal, at such convenient period, previous to its expiration, as may insure to their respective subjects or citizens, as aforesaid, the uninterrupted benefit which they expect from its provisions: Provided always, That either Power may, if it deem it expedient, upon giving six months' previous notice to the other, wholly abrogate and annul the present treaty.

6. It is agreed that nothing contained in the preceding articles shall be understood to impair or affect the rights and principles on which the high contracting parties have heretofore acted in respect to any of the matters to which these stipulations refer, except so far as the same shall have been modified, restrained, or suspended by the said articles. And whenever the present convention shall cease to be in operation, either by the expiration of the term for which it is enacted, without any renewal of the same, or by the abrogation thereof by either of the contracting parties, as hereinbefore provided, or (which God forbid) by any war between the high contracting parties, each of the said high contracting parties shall stand, with respect to the other, as to its said rights and principles, as if no such convention had ever been made.

ARTICLE D.

(a.) Whenever one of the high contracting parties shall be at war, any vessel of the other party, sailing for a port or place belonging to an enemy of the party at war, without knowing that the same is blockaded, may be turned away from such port or place; but she shall not be detained on account of such blockade, unless, after such notice, she shall again attempt to enter. And, in order to determine what characterizes a blockade, it is agreed that that denomination shall apply only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power which blockades it with a naval force, stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering.

(b.) In order to regulate what is in future to be deemed contraband of war, it is agreed that under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or by sea, such as cannon, mortars, muskets, pistols, and other fire-arms, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, saucisses, rockets, carriages for cannon, firelocks, musket-rests, bandoliers, gunpowder, saltpetre, match, balls and bullets, helmets or head-pieces, cuirasses, swords, pikes, halberds, lances, javelins, saddles, bridles, and other horse furniture, holsters, pouches, belts, and generally all other implements of war; as, also, timber for shipbuilding, tar, or rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and planks only excepted; and all the above articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy.

(c.) In all cases of unfounded detention, or other contravention of the regulations stipulated by the present treaty, the owners of the vessel and cargo detained shall be allowed damages proportioned to the loss occasioned thereby, together with the costs and charges of the trial. All proper measures shall be taken to prevent delays in deciding the cases of ships or cargoes so brought in for adjudication, and in payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be paid to the masters or owners of such ships or cargoes. And whenever sentence shall be pronounced against any vessel thus captured or detained, or against her cargo, or any part thereof, a duly authenticated copy of all the proceedings in the cause, and of the said sentence, shall, if required, be delivered without delay, to the commanders of the said vessels, or to the owner thereof, or to the agent of either, on payment of all legal fees and demands for the same.

The commanders of ships-of-war and privateers of the belligerent party shall, in the searching of the merchant ships of the other party, conduct themselves according to the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations, and as favorably, moreover, as towards the most friendly Power that may remain neutral. The said commanders, their officers, and crews, shall forbear doing any damage to the subjects or citizens of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary they shall be punished, and shall also make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damage may be.

(d.) The ships-of-war and privateers of the two nations, as well as their prizes, shall be treated in their respective ports as those of the most favored nation.

It shall not be lawful for any Power or State at war with either of the high contracting parties, or the subjects or citizens of such Power or State, to fit out or arm ships-of-war, or privateers, in the ports of the other of the high contracting parties, nor to sell what they may take as prize from the ships or vessels of the high contracting party with whom such Power or State may be at war, in the ports of the other, nor in any other manner to exchange the same; nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that Power or State to which they belong.

(e.) In the event of a shipwreck happening to any vessel or vessels belonging to either of the high contracting parties, or their subjects and citizens, on the coasts of the other, every assistance shall be given for the protection of the unfortunate persons, and for the preservation of the ship, cargo, and all effects which may be saved, either from on board the ship, or in any other manner whatever; and the same shall not be concealed, nor detained, nor damaged, under any pretext whatever. On the contrary, the same shall be preserved and restored to them, upon a suitable recompense being given to those who shall have assisted in saving their persons, vessels, or effects.

(f.) If at any time a rupture should take place (which God forbid) between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, neither the debts due from individuals of one of the two nations to individuals of the other, nor shares or moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall be sequestered or confiscated; and the merchants and others of each of the two nations residing in the dominions of the other shall in no case be detained as prisoners of war, but they shall be permitted to remove, with their families, effects, and property; each Government having, nevertheless, the right, during their remaining in its dominions, to make such regulations, and to take such precautions as it may deem necessary with respect to such persons.

MEMORANDUM E.

Upon the subject of these articles numbered from a to k, which were brought forward by the American Plenipotentiaries, and annexed to the protocol of the third conference, the British Plenipotentiaries stated that, although they were not instructed to bring any of these topics before the conferences on the part of Great Britain, and although they considered it by no means necessary that the two countries should now come to any conventional arrangement relating to them, they were, nevertheless, ready to agree to the annexed articles (a, b, c, d, e, f.) which embraced all the points upon which, in their judgment, it was expedient that the two countries should enter into positive stipulations.

Slaves.

ARTICLE. Whereas it was agreed by the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, that "all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property:" And whereas, under the aforesaid article, the United States claim for their citizens, and as their private property, the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves who, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, were in any territory, places, or possessions whatsoever, directed by the said treaty to be restored to the United States, but then still occupied by the British forces, whether such slaves were, at the date aforesaid, on shore or on board any British vessels lying in waters within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States. And whereas differences have arisen whether, by the true intent and meaning of the aforesaid article of the Treaty of Ghent, the United States are entitled to the restitution of, or full compensation for, all or any slaves, as above described; the high contracting parties do hereby agree to refer the said difference to some friendly Sovereign or State, to be named for that purpose; and the high contracting parties further engage to consider the decision of such friendly Sovereign or State to be final and conclusive on all the matters referred.

Relations with Great Britain.

No. 10.

In lieu of the latter part of the article insert: "And it is agreed that any such country as may be claimed by either party on the Northwest coast of America, or on the continent of America westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of this treaty, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two Powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the last-mentioned country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other Power or State to any part of the said country—the only object of the two high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

No. 11.

Protocol of the eighth conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on the 19th of October, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The protocols of the two preceding conferences were agreed to and signed.

The several articles upon the fisheries; the boundary; the territory westward of the Stony mountains; the captured slaves; and the renewal of the existing commercial convention, were agreed to.

The American Plenipotentiaries expressed their regret that the rejection of several of the amendments which they had offered to the project on impressment, and which they deemed essential, compelled them to decline acceding to that project.

The great alterations made by the British Plenipotentiaries to the articles proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries on maritime rights, also induced the latter to think that, although a season of peace appeared the most favorable time for arranging such subjects, it would be inexpedient to discuss them any further, more especially as it had never been the intention of the American Plenipotentiaries to adopt or propose any articles upon maritime subjects, without an adjustment of that on impressment.

The British Plenipotentiaries brought forward an article, as annexed, (F.) upon the subject of the direct intercourse between the West Indies and the United States of America; but they stated that they could not consent to sign any article upon that subject, unless the American Plenipotentiaries were prepared at the same time to accede to articles which should put the intercourse between Bermuda and the United States, as well as between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the United States, upon the footing contemplated in the article originally offered by the British Government with respect to Bermuda, and in that respecting Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, brought forward at a former conference by the British Plenipotentiaries.

The American Plenipotentiaries declared that their instructions did not authorize them to sign the West India article as proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, but agreed to take the whole question ad referendum to their Governments.

It was agreed to meet on Friday, the 20th instant.

ALBERT GALLATIN,
RICHARD RUSH,
FREDERICK J. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN.

F.

It is agreed that the vessels of the United States shall have liberty to import from* [any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, to] any of the ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies, which shall be open to the vessels of any other foreign Power or State, tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, staves, headings, shingles, horses, mules, poultry, live stock, and provisions of all sorts, except salted provisions of any description, whether meat, fish, or butter, such articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to import, in the same manner, any other articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which into the above-mentioned ports shall not be entirely prohibited from every other foreign country or place.

The vessels of the United States shall likewise have liberty to export from any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies, to any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, rum, molasses, and salt, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of His Britannic Majesty's above-mentioned dominions in the West Indies; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to export, in the same manner, any other articles of the said growth, produce, or manufacture, the exportation of which in foreign vessels from the said ports to any other foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited.

British vessels shall, in the same manner, have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions to any of the ports of the United States, rum, molasses, and salt, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's above-mentioned dominions in the West Indies; and British vessels shall also have liberty to import, in the same manner, any other article of the said growth, produce, or manufacture, the exportation of which from the said dominions of His Britannic Majesty to the United States shall be allowed as aforesaid in vessels of the United States.

British vessels shall likewise have liberty to export from any of the aforesaid ports of the United States to any of the aforesaid ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies, tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, staves, headings, shingles, horses, mules, poultry, live stock, and provisions of all sorts, except salted provisions of any description, whether meat, fish, or butter, such articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States; and the said vessels shall also have liberty to export, in the same manner, every other article, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which into the British ports from the said United States shall be allowed in vessels of the United States.

The vessels of either of the two parties, employed in the trade provided for by this article, shall be admitted in the ports of the other, as above mentioned, without paying any other or higher duties or charges than those payable in the same ports by the vessels of such other party; and they shall have liberty, respectively, to touch, during the same voyage, at one or more of the above-mentioned ports of the other party, for the purpose of disposing of their inward and of taking on board their outward cargoes.

No other or higher duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any of the articles which may be imported therein, by virtue of this article, when imported in British vessels, than when imported in vessels of the United States; nor when imported directly from the above-mentioned ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, than when imported in a circuitous manner. And no other or higher duties shall be paid on the importation into any of the above-mentioned ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions of any of the articles which may be imported therein by virtue of this article, when imported in vessels of the United States, than when imported in British vessels; nor when imported directly from the United States, than when imported in a circuitous manner. It is agreed, moreover, that no other or higher duties shall be charged upon any of the above-mentioned articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the two countries, respectively, when imported by virtue of this article, on the one hand, into the said ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, or into the ports of the United States, on the other, than may be charged on similar articles when imported from any other foreign country; but His Britannic Majesty reserves to himself the right to impose higher duties upon all articles so allowed to be imported into the said British ports from the United States, than are, or may be, chargeable upon all similar articles, when imported from any of His Majesty's dominions: Provided, That in such case such similar articles shall be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's possessions. The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties shall be allowed on the exportation of any articles which may, by virtue of this article, be exported either from the said ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in the West Indies to the United States, as from the United States to the above-mentioned ports, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

No. 12.

Protocol of the ninth conference between the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at Whitehall, on the 20th of October, 1818.

Present: Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Rush, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn.

The protocol of the preceding conference was agreed to and signed. The Plenipotentiaries then proceeded to sign the convention.

ALBERT GALLATIN,
RICHARD RUSH,
FREDERICK J. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN.

LONDON, October 27, 1818.

SIR: I had the honor to write you a few lines on the 19th instant, and immediately forwarded them in triplicate to the Consul at Liverpool, to be sent off by the earliest ships, to say that we had on that day agreed to sign a treaty with the British Plenipotentiaries on the points which I enumerated. It was signed on the 20th. The joint despatch from Mr. Gallatin and myself, bearing date on the same day, giving an account of the whole progress of the negotiation, was, together with the convention itself and all the accompanying documents, forwarded from hence to Liverpool on the 24th.

After consulting with Mr. Gallatin, I did not feel at liberty to employ a special messenger to be the bearer of the convention, trusting to the ordinary opportunities by our merchant vessels, which are so constant, and in general so safe. I accompanied the packet with a special letter to Mr. Maury, apprizing him of the importance of committing it to hands that were trustworthy, and with directions that it should be delivered to the postmaster at New York, or wherever else the ship may arrive, without any delay. It will thus, I hope, reach Washington with all expedition and safety. On the side of the British Plenipotentiaries a special secretary was employed for the business of this negotiation. On ours Mr. Smith has acted; a circumstance which is alluded to only that I may add how unremitting has been his attention, and how useful his services. Mr. Gallatin set out on his return to Paris on the morning of the 22d. Duplicates of the convention, the despatch, and all the other papers, will be transmitted at the earliest moment that they can be copied.

After what is said in your despatch of the 28th of July, to the joint mission, respecting Judge Wallace's decree, on the 29th of August, 1817, at Halifax, in the cases of the captured fishing vessels, it is proper I should state that I have been informed by Mr. Slade, in a note of the 14th of this month, that no appeal has been entered by the captors from the sentences of restitution; and that, the time having now gone by allowed by the practice of the admiralty for entering appeals, none can be entered. He adds, that as the owners of the vessels were obliged to give bail at Halifax to answer the appeals, it is possible that they may also have been made to place counter-security in the hands of the bail; in which case, the bail may refuse to part with such security, without a desertion from the appellate court here—that is, a decree that the appeals had not been prosecuted, and that the original sentence should be carried into effect. But as such a decree would be attended with expense, he does not advise it for the present. In the event of its becoming necessary to the owners, they should be informed that they cannot have the benefit of it until office copies of the decrees of restitution at Halifax are first forwarded. Mr. Slade is the proctor whom I employed contingently to give attention to these cases, as mentioned in my despatch of the 21st of March.

From the instructions of the 28th of July, I infer that Government contemplated becoming instrumental to the solemn argument of the great question of right under the treaty of 1783, only in the event of no article respecting the fisheries being agreed upon. As one has been signed, I design to take no further steps on this head, should the convention be ratified, without further instructions from the Department. I mention this, perceiving from the newspapers that there have been fresh captures of our fishing vessels during the last season, followed by sentences of condemnation, from which appeals on the part of the claimants may, I take it for granted, be anticipated. With very great respect, &c.

RICHARD RUSH.

Mr. Adams to Messrs. Gallatin and Rush.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 2, 1818.

GENTLEMEN: From the despatches which, since I last had the honor of writing to you, have been received at this Department, from Mr. Rush, dated the 24th and 26th of June and the 15th of August, it appears that there are two subjects likely to be brought under consideration in your conferences with the British Plenipotentiaries, which were not contemplated by the President at the time when your former instructions were prepared—impressment and the slave trade.

Impressment.

In the notes, Nos. 1 and 2, delivered by Mr. Rush to Lord Castlereagh, the first on the 18th of April, and the second on the 20th of June, both the offers had been made to the British Government, warranted by his former instructions of legislative measures for excluding British seamen from the naval and merchant service of the United States, on condition of a formal stipulation on the part of Great Britain that the impressment of men from the vessels of the United States shall henceforth cease.

Both these proposals, at the time when they were offered, or shortly afterwards, had been rejected, with an intimation from Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Rush, in the latter instance, that the objections of the British Cabinet against them would be presented in writing.

Afterwards, however, on the 14th of August, he expressed his willingness that the subject should be taken up in the proposed negotiation of a commercial treaty, and avowed, as an opinion of his own, upon which he had, indeed, not consulted with his colleagues in the Cabinet, that these proposals might, with certain modifications, which he thought very important to Great Britain, and of little moment to the essential object of the United States, be rendered acceptable. These were: 1. That the treaty containing the stipulation should be limited to a duration of ten or twelve years, with liberty to each party to be absolved from its stipulations on a notice of three or six months. 2. That the British boarding officer, entering American ships at sea for a purpose justified under the laws of nations, should have the liberty of calling for a list of the crew, and, if he saw a man whom he knew or suspected of being an Englishman, he should, without taking the man, have the privilege of making a record or procès verbal of the fact, to be presented to the consideration of the American Government.

These suggestions have received the fullest and most deliberate consideration of the President, with the earnest disposition on his part to view them in the most favorable light. He welcomes them, especially, as the first indications of a consciousness in the British Cabinet that the permanency of peace between the two countries is utterly incompatible with the resumption of the practice of impressing men from our vessels on the high seas—a conviction so profoundly impressed upon his own mind, that he scarcely thinks any discouragement could justify a remission of our efforts to remove this inevitable cause of future collisions, so long as the practice hitherto persevered in shall continue to exist.

It is readily agreed that the treaty to contain the stipulation shall be limited in duration to eight, ten, or twelve years; but that either party should have the liberty of putting an end to the whole treaty by a notice of three or six months, would seem to place the whole commercial relations between the two countries upon too precarious a foundation. Some of the stipulations proposed in your negotiation are, in their nature, intended to be permanent, even in the event of a war; others would require legislative regulations to protect interests which would be deeply affected by the sudden termination of the treaty. The President, nevertheless, authorizes you to agree that, besides the general limitation of the temporary articles of the treaty to eight, ten, or twelve years, either party shall be at liberty to dissolve them after a notice of two years given to and received by the other; or, if preferable to the British Government, the article relative to impressment may be made a separate article, distinct from the rest of the treaty, and limited to a term of four years. This course would, indeed, be most convenient, as it would give us the opportunity of taking the sense of the Senate upon it, without implicating it with the other parts of the treaty. Our intention and expectation is, that the practice of taking men from our ships being once formally renounced by Great Britain, she will, in point of fact, never recur to it again.

If the intention of Lord Castlereagh was that this right of dissolving the compact by a notice of three or six months should apply only to the article against impressment, its acceptance is objectionable on other grounds. The engagement to exclude all British seamen from our sea service will operate, immediately from its commencement, with some inconvenience to our merchants. Since the peace and the dispersion of the vast number of seamen disbanded from the British navy, there are, no doubt, considerable numbers of them who have found employment on board of our vessels, and their exclusion from them will not be accomplished without some inconvenience. The effect of the stipulation of Great Britain to take no men from our vessels is remote, and contingent upon the event of her being engaged in a maritime war with other Powers: the onerous part of the engagement is, therefore, to us immediate and certain; the benefit to be derived from it distant and eventual. If to this apparent inequality should be added a power reserved by Great Britain to cancel the bargain by a simple notice of three or six months, we could scarcely consider it as a contract. It would be a positive concession and sacrifice, on our part, for the mere chance of a future equivalent for it, altogether dependent upon the will of the other party. The alternatives now proposed, it is hoped, will answer the purposes intended by the expedient suggested by Lord Castlereagh, without being equally liable to the difficulties which arrest our assent to it otherwise than as thus modified. It would also be desirable that the commencement of the engagement to exclude British seamen should be postponed for some time, (say to the 1st of October, 1820,) that a sufficient notice may be given to the merchants and mariners whose interests will be affected by it.

The second proposal (that British officers entering our merchant vessels for purposes warranted by the law of nations shall be authorized to call for the list of the crew, and, if they should find or suspect an Englishman to be on board, make a record of the fact for the purpose of remonstrance to the Government of the United States) is, in the view of the President, still more objectionable. In the first place, the distrust which it implies that the laws for excluding British seamen will, though stipulated, not be faithfully executed, is not warranted by any experience, nor can this Government give countenance to it by assenting to any stipulation which would be considered as resulting from it. If the United States bind themselves to this exclusion, they will sincerely and faithfully carry it into execution. It was not expressly asked by Lord Castlereagh in his proposal, as reported by Mr. Rush, that the officer, in calling for the shipping paper, should also have the power of mustering the crew, to examine them by comparison with the list; but as the mere view of the list would be useless unless coupled with that power, we consider it as having been intended to be included in the proposal; and this very inspection of the crews of our vessels by a foreign officer has been found among the most insulting and grievous aggravations of the practice of impressment. Besides this, the tendency of such an examination in every single instance would be, to produce altercation between the British officer and the commander of the American vessel. If the officer should be authorized to make a record of his suspicions, the master, on his side, and the suspected seamen, must of course have the privilege of making their counter-record; and as there would be no tribunal to judge between them, the probable ultimate result could be no other than that of exciting irritation between the two nations, and fractious discussions between the Governments.

If the engagement to exclude British seamen from our service should fail of being executed to an extent worthy of the slightest attention of the British Government, they could not avoid having notice of it, by proofs more effectual and more abundant than could be furnished by this sort of scrutiny. A failure of execution on our part to any such extent would give them not only the right of remonstrating to ours, but even of cancelling their obligation within a lapse of time, which must guard them against the danger of any material national injury. We have the fullest confidence that, if the engagement on both sides be once contracted, Great Britain will, thenceforward, have no lawful or even plausible motive either for wishing it cancelled, or for inspecting the crews of our vessels in search of men.

Slave Trade.

The President desires that you would make known to the British Government his sensibility to the friendly spirit of confidence with which the treaties lately contracted by Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, and the legislative measures of Parliament founded upon them, have been communicated to this Government, and the invitation to the United States to join in the same, or similar arrangements, has been given. He wishes you, also, to give the strongest assurances that the solicitude of the United States for the accomplishment of the common object—the total and final abolition of that odious traffic—continues with all the earnestness which has so long and so steadily distinguished the course of their policy in relation to it. As an evidence of this earnestness, he requests you to communicate to them a copy of the act of Congress of the last session, in addition to the act of 1807, to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States, (acts of the last session, chapter 86, page 81,) and to declare the readiness of this Government, within their Constitutional powers, to adopt any further measures which experience may prove to be necessary for the purpose of obtaining so desirable an end.

But you will observe that, in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all their essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States.

The power agreed to be reciprocally given to officers of the ships of war of either party to enter, search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution, by each treaty, of two mixed Courts, one of which to reside in the external or colonial possessions of each of the two parties, respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity, without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation to search the merchant vessels of another, would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies either on the coast of Africa or in the West Indies, cannot give effect.

You will add that, by the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and that they shall be removable by impeachment and conviction of crimes or misdemeanors. There may be some doubt whether the power of the Government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the Territories of the United States—a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon the statutes of the United States without appeal.

That the disposal of the negroes found on board the slave-trading vessels which might be condemned by the sentence of these mixed courts, cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for, if the slaves of a vessel condemned by the mixed court should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as free men, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being, in this Union, regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognised as free.

That the admission of a right in the officers of foreign ships of war to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country. That there would be no prospect of a ratification, by advice and consent of the Senate, to any stipulation of that nature. That the search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country, that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted to a time of peace. And that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light, if, as in the treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships of war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships of war of another.

You will, therefore, express the regret of the President that the stipulations in the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh are of a character to which the peculiar situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede. The Constitutional objection may be the more readily understood by the British Cabinet, if they are reminded that it was an obstacle proceeding from the same principle which prevented Great Britain from becoming, formally, a party to the Holy Alliance; neither can they be at a loss to perceive the embarrassment under which we should be placed, by receiving cargoes of African negroes, and be bound at once to guaranty their liberty, and to employ them as servants. Whether they will be as ready to enter into our feelings, with regard to the search, by foreign navy lieutenants, of vessels under convoy of our own naval commanders, is, perhaps, of no material importance. The other reasons are presumed to be amply sufficient to convince them that the motives for declining this overture are compatible with an earnest wish that the measures concerted by these treaties may prove successful in extirpating that root of numberless evils—the traffic in human blood; and with the determination to co-operate, to the utmost extent of our powers, in this great vindication of the sacred rights of humanity.

LONDON, Dec. 8, 1818.

The despatch of the 2d November, addressed to Mr. Gallatin and myself, arrived here on the 6th instant.

Of the subjects to which it relates, viz., impressment and the slave trade, the department will have been long since informed by our joint communications that only the former had a place in the late negotiation. As we came to no agreement on it, I am happy to think that none of the expectations of the President will have been departed from. It will also have been seen that, had this despatch reached us before the negotiation closed, although it would have affected our conduct on one of the points, the result would have been the same. I design to transmit a copy of it to Paris for Mr. Gallatin's information.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 1, 1818.

Your despatches to No. 36, inclusive, have been received at this office. Of the various subjects to which they relate, and which appear to require particular notice, I propose now to take a review, according to the successive order of their dates.

The first is No. 22, dated 19th June, and enclosing your correspondence with Lord Castlereagh relative to a passage in a printed report of a committee of the House of Representatives of the United States to that body, mentioning the rejection by the President of the four articles which had been proposed by the British Government as additions to the commercial convention of 3d July, 1815, and approving that rejection, upon an idea entertained by the committee that the fourth of those articles would have interfered with the settled policy of the United States in relation to the Indians within their limits. This remark of the committee appears to have affected the sensibility of the British Cabinet upon two grounds: first, as they considered that the rejection of those articles had not been previously communicated to them; and, secondly, because they thought the article in question did not bear the construction, and they explicitly disclaimed the intention that it should bear such a construction as the committee of Congress had thought applicable to it.

With regard to the first point, the explanation which ensued between you and Lord Castlereagh appears to have placed it in the proper point of view. The articles had been presented to your predecessor as embracing the utmost extent which the British Government would consent to give to our commercial intercourse with their colonial possessions in this hemisphere. Before your departure from this country, the President had made up his mind not to accept them, and your instructions had authorized you to make this determination known to the British Government in the manner which it was supposed would be most friendly and conciliatory. The articles had been delivered without any accompanying document, note, or commentary; and as it was not believed here that they could, under any modification, be made the basis of an arrangement between the two Governments, upon the subject to which they relate, and as it was given us explicitly to understand that Great Britain could concede nothing more of relaxations to her colonial and navigation system, it was thought useless to enter into discussion, of which there was no prospect that it would terminate in agreement, and which might tend to irritation, and that the most inoffensive manner of communicating the non-acceptance of the articles would be verbally, in a personal interview between yourself and Lord Castlereagh. On reference to your report of your first conference with him, on the 3d of January, it appears that the part of your instructions to which I allude was then executed; and that, without using the unaccommodating term of rejection, you communicated to him the disposition of the President, with regard to the four articles, in a manner altogether congenial to the spirit of that formula of the British Constitution by which the dissent of the Crown is signified to an act which has passed both Houses of Parliament—le Roy s'avisera. There was, indeed, so little of ambiguity in the intimations given by you at that time, that when, before the receipt of your despatch No. 22, Mr. Bagot came to me with a copy of Lord Castlereagh's note to you of 29th May, which had been sent to him, I recurred immediately to the file of your despatches, and read to him that part of your report of what passed between you and Lord Castlereagh at your conference on the 3d of January; observing to him that I had little imagined, after that disclosure of the President's sentiments concerning the four articles, that the British Government would have expected any further reference to them on the part of the United States.

A copy of the four articles was furnished to the committee of the House of Representatives charged with the duty of reporting to the House upon the state of the commercial relations between the United States and the British West Indies. That committee drew their own conclusions upon the probable operation of the articles, and particularly of the fourth. They were communicated to them without comment on the part of the Executive. They knew the articles had not been accepted, but the reasons of the non-acceptance had not been stated to them. It is true that the article was the same which, at the negotiation of the commercial convention of July, 1815, had been offered by the British Plenipotentiaries; that the objection to it, now suggested by the committee, had, at that time, been avowed by those of the United States; that the British Plenipotentiaries did then disclaim the intention of giving it a construction which would import the admission of British traders to any intercourse with Indians within the territories of the United States, and did offer to introduce into the article any words which might be necessary to guard it against that construction; and that the article was then finally declined upon another ground. But the same reason for declining it still subsists, and is now as operative as it was in 1815; and, if it did not occur to the committee, it was because the other, being more obvious upon the face of the article as presented to them, doubtless struck them more forcibly, as of itself decisive, and needing no further notice of objections less important, though not less insuperable.

In the negotiation with which you are now occupied, for the renewal and extension of that compact, we have not altogether abandoned the hope that the British Cabinet will ultimately concede something further of principle; and, if this article should be discussed in your conferences, that they will consent to remove the other feature of exclusion from it, which still renders it inadmissible. Your powers will enable you to agree to it with such modifications as may divest it both of the exceptionable construction disclaimed, and of the restrictive exclusion yet adhered to by Great Britain.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Rush.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 7, 1819.

SIR: From the documents transmitted by Mr. Gallatin and you, relating to the negotiation of the commercial convention of 20th October last, it appears—

That, at the third conference, a draught of two articles was proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States, and, 1, the British islands in the West Indies, and, 2, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in North America.

That, at the fifth conference, the British Plenipotentiaries offered the counter-projet of an article for the intercourse between the United States and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and, at the eighth conference, an article for that between the United States and the British West Indies.

That, in presenting this last article, they stated that they could not consent to sign an article upon that subject unless the American Plenipotentiaries would accede, in substance, to the article proposed at the fifth conference concerning Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and to an article proposed by the British Government on the 19th of March, 1817, concerning the trade between the United States and the island of Bermuda.

And that the American Plenipotentiaries, not feeling themselves authorized by their instructions to sign the West India article as proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, agreed to take the whole question ad referendum to their Government.

In comparing the West India article, proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries at the third conference, with that offered by the British Plenipotentiaries at the eighth, it appears—

1. That, in the American projet, the ports in the West Indies proposed to be opened to American shipping are specifically named; while, in the British projet, they are only designated as the ports which shall be open to the vessels of any other foreign Power or State. It is observed, in your joint letter of 20th October, that these ports are the same as those proposed by the American projet, with the exception of St. Christopher's, St. Lucia, Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice; but the difference between the two draughts is otherwise material; for, if the ports were specifically named, the privilege of admission to them would be positive, and not revocable at the pleasure of Great Britain; but if passing under the general description, it might at any time be revoked merely by prohibiting the admission to any other foreign vessels.

2. That, in the American projet, the articles of naval stores, provisions, and lumber, in general terms, are among those stipulated for admission; while, in the British counter-projet, the naval stores are restricted to pitch, tar, and turpentine; the lumber to staves, headings, and shingles; and from the article of provisions are excepted salted provisions of every description. The American article provides for the liberty of importing other articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and the importation of which shall not be entirely prohibited from every other place whatever. The British article narrows the limitation to articles not prohibited from every other foreign place, so that it would reject articles which might, at the same time, be imported from the British colonies in North America.

3. That the American projet provides for the liberty of exporting molasses and salt, (omitting rum,) and sugar and coffee, to the amount of one-fourth part of the tonnage of the vessel, and other articles, the exportation of which to other foreign countries is not entirely prohibited. The British projet, adding the article of rum, denies those of coffee and sugar, and allows only the exportation of other articles not prohibited to be exported to other foreign countries in foreign vessels; so that articles allowed to be exported to other foreign countries in British vessels would still be prohibited from exportation in vessels of the United States.

These differences, so important in themselves, became still further aggravated by a comparison between the two articles for regulating the intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, respectively connected with the West India trade article. The American proposal is, that the vessels of both nations should be allowed to export from the United States into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the same articles, the importation of which should be allowable by the West India article into the West Indies in American vessels, and any other articles, the importation of which from every other country should not be prohibited; and that the vessels of both nations should have liberty to import from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into the United States, gypsum and grindstones, and any other article the growth, produce, or manufacture of those provinces, the importation of which into the United States from every other foreign country shall not be prohibited.

The British proposal is, that the vessels of both nations should be allowed to export from the United States into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, not only the same articles to be admitted by the direct trade to the West Indies, but the additional articles of scantling, planks, hoops, fruits, and seeds, with a specific enumeration of grain and breadstuffs instead of provisions; and that the vessels of both nations should be allowed to import from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into the United States, not only gypsum, grindstones, and any other articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said provinces, but also any produce or manufacture of any part of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, the importation of which into the United States shall not be entirely prohibited.

To complete this review, we are to compare the proposals of the two parties in relation to the trade between the United States and the island of Bermuda.

The American proposal is to include it in the West India trade article, and thereby place it on precisely the same footing as the West India islands.

The British article of 19th March, 1817, proposed that the vessels of both nations should be allowed to import from the United States into the island of Bermuda, not only the articles proposed by the British West India article to be admissible in the West Indies, but hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, plank, timber, and lumber of any sort, breadstuffs enumerated, and grain of any sort, of the growth or production of the United States; and that they should be allowed to export from Bermuda to the United States any goods or commodities whatsoever, exportable by law from the British West Indies to any foreign country in Europe; and, also, sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoa-nuts, ginger, and pimento, and all goods of British growth, produce, or manufacture.

The views of the British Government, in these connected proposals, are elucidated by the right which, in the West India trade article, they insist upon reserving, to impose higher duties upon all articles so importable from the United States to the West Indies, than upon all similar articles when imported from any of His Majesty's dominions, and being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's possessions; and, by the statement of the British Plenipotentiaries, at the eighth conference, as entered upon the protocol, that they could not sign any article concerning the direct trade between the United States and the West Indies, unless with their proposed articles concerning the intercourse of the United States with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and with the island of Bermuda.

No objection will, on our part, be made to the exception of the articles proposed by the British project to be excluded entirely from the trade, namely, salted provisions of every description, although their probable value is equal to one-third of the whole mass of the exports to the West Indies; but it cannot be disguised that, if the three articles, taken together, would not, in their immediate operation, secure the carrying of the whole trade in British shipping, to the exclusion of that of the United States, they would at least leave the ultimate operation entirely at the discretion of the British Government, who, by proportioning the difference of duties upon the articles of our growth, produce, or manufacture, and upon the like articles of the produce, growth, or manufacture of the British dominions, to the experience of their own interest, may annul entirely the direct importations, and secure the conveyance of the whole to their own ships. They agreed, indeed, to stipulate that the duties upon the direct shall not be other or higher than upon the indirect importations; but all the effect of this engagement is demolished by the right reserved of imposing higher duties on articles of our growth, produce, or manufacture, than upon like articles of their own; for, as the indirect importations would be exclusively in British vessels, it must be expected that all articles imported from British colonies would be received as British produce, without scrutiny with regard to their origin; and thus the produce or manufactures of the United States, imported indirectly through Halifax, St. John's, or Bermuda, would be received as of British produce or manufacture, and less imposed than the same articles imported directly from the United States. And the reserved right of aggravating the duty upon the direct importation being unlimited, might at any time, at the pleasure of the British Government, be made equivalent to a total prohibition; while, at the same time, our power of countervailing legislation would be locked up by the terms of the compact.

With the convention of 20th October, all the documents transmitted by you, relating to the negotiation, were submitted to the Senate. Those relating to the subject of this suspended article were referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations of that body, by whom, towards the close of the session, a confidential report was made; a copy of which is herewith enclosed. The shortness of the time not having admitted of a discussion of the report, it was referred to this Department; and as it is probable that, unless an amicable arrangement of the subject can be effected before the next winter by negotiation, the measures suggested at the close of the report, as essential for completing the experiment of our counteracting system, will be brought forward in Congress, the President, always preferring the principle of arrangement by amicable compromise to the conflict of adversary laws, wishes to make another effort to prevail upon the British Cabinet to adjust this concern by mutual concession, and upon terms of practical reciprocity.

You are, therefore, authorized to agree to two additional articles, as supplementary to the convention, accepting the restricted list of articles as proposed by the article which the British Plenipotentiaries offered at the eighth conference, and submitting to the exclusion of salted provisions, and to the confined list of naval stores and lumber, among the importable, and to the exclusion of sugar and coffee from the list of the exportable articles in American vessels, in the direct trade with the West Indies; but with the condition that the list of importable articles to the West Indies shall be the same as that to Bermuda and to the North American colonies; and that the exportable articles shall be confined to such as are of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British West India and North American colonies; and that no other or higher duties shall be payable on importations from the United States, directly or indirectly, than on similar articles imported from any foreign country, or from any of the British colonies themselves.

A draught of two articles to this effect, and forming a compromise between the articles proposed by you at the third, and those offered by the British Plenipotentiaries at the fifth and eighth conferences, is herewith enclosed. We consent, by this proposal, to restrict the list of articles to be admitted in the trade, even as the British Cabinet itself desires; but we adhere to the principle that, of this traffic, thus limited, our shipping shall have the chance of carrying its fair proportion, and shall stand upon equal terms of competition with the British. It is not intended that you should be confined to the letter of this draught. It may be modified in regard to the expression, as you think proper; and, if desired by the British Government, the two passages included within brackets in the draught of the first article may be omitted. But you will candidly state to Lord Castlereagh, that our ultimate object of participating in the navigation of this necessary trade having been explicitly avowed, must be steadily pursued; that we may deem it more for our interest to leave it on the footing of reciprocal mutual regulation, than to bind ourselves by any compact, the result of which must be to disappoint us of that object; that we think the effect of the three articles declared to be inseparable by the British Plenipotentiaries, would be to deprive us even of the portion of the carrying trade which we have already secured by our existing laws, and which we believe we can further secure; and that it is far better for the harmony of the two nations to avoid any bargain in which either party, after agreeing to it, shall have, by the experience of its effect, the sentiment of having been overreached brought home to its councils. We ask for no such engagement on the part of Great Britain. We have too much confidence in the wisdom and liberality of her Cabinet to believe that they would wish to obtain such an engagement from us. At every step of counteracting regulation that we have taken, or shall take, in this concern, we proceed with reluctance, because we are convinced it might be adjusted more to the mutual interest and mutual understanding by amicable arrangement than by countervailing legislation. But, to whatever arrangement we may subscribe, we are convinced it can answer no useful purpose, unless it shall prove to be founded on the reciprocity of real effects, instead of hinging upon that of words.

Your power heretofore given is considered sufficient to authorize you to sign two additional articles of the substance of those enclosed, with any person or persons duly authorized by the British Government. If agreed to, they may be declared supplementary to those of the convention of the 20th of October, and to be of the same duration. They must, of course, be submitted to the sanction of the Senate for ratification here.

I am, very respectfully, sir your most obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

ART. 1. The vessels of the United States and British vessels shall have liberty to import, from any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, into any of the following ports, namely: Kingston, Savannah le Mer, Montego bay, Santa Lucia, Antonio, Saint Anne, Falmouth, and Porta Maria, in the island of Jamaica; San Joseph, in the island of Trinidad; Scarborough, in the island of Tobago; Saint George, in the island of Granada; Kingston, in the island of Saint Vincent; Bridgetown, in the island of Barbadoes; Rosseau, in the island of Dominica; St. John's, in the island of Antigua; Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola; the principal port of Turk's Island; Nassau, in the island of New Providence; Pittstown, in Crooked Island; and the principal port of the island of Bermuda, tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, staves, headings, shingles, horses, mules, poultry, live stock, and provisions of all sorts, (except salted provisions of any description, whether meat, fish, or butter,) such articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, [and any other articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, the importation of which into the above-mentioned ports shall not be entirely prohibited from every other foreign country or place.] And the vessels of the United States and British vessels shall have liberty to export, from any of the said ports of His Britannic Majesty's dominions, to any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, rum, molasses, and salt, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned dominions, [and any other articles of the said growth, produce, or manufacture, the exportation of which to any other foreign country or place shall not be entirely prohibited.]

The vessels of either party, employed in the trade provided for by this article, shall be admitted in the ports of the other, as above mentioned, without paying any other or higher duties or charges than those payable in the same ports by the vessels of such other party; and they shall have liberty, respectively, to touch, during the same voyage, at one or more of the above-mentioned ports of the other party, for the purpose of disposing of their inward, and of taking on board their outward cargoes.

No other or higher duties shall be paid on the importation from the United States into the above-mentioned ports of the British colonies, or from the said ports into the United States, of any of the articles importable by virtue of this convention, when imported in the vessels of either of the two nations, than when imported in the vessels of the other; nor when imported directly between the United States and the said ports, or vice versa, than when imported in a circuitous manner. No other or higher duties shall be charged upon any of the above-mentioned articles, when imported by virtue of this convention into the United States, or into any of the ports aforesaid, than may be charged on similar articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or from any other country or place whatsoever into the said ports. The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties shall be allowed on the exportation of any articles which may, by virtue of this article, be exported from the said British ports to the United States, or from the United States to the said ports, whether in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

ART. 2. The vessels of the United States and British vessels shall have liberty to export from any of the ports of the United States to which any foreign vessels are permitted to come, to the ports of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and of St. John's, in New Brunswick, and to any other port within the said provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to which vessels of any other foreign nation shall be admitted, any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, which, by virtue of the preceding article, is importable from the United States into the British colonial ports therein named, and upon the same terms in regard to the payment of duties and charges; and they shall have liberty to import from any of the aforesaid ports within the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, into any of the aforesaid ports of the United States, gypsum and grindstones, the produce or manufacture of the said provinces, and any other articles of the said produce or manufacture, the exportation of which from the said provinces, and the importation of which into the United States, to or from any other foreign country, shall not be altogether prohibited. The vessels of either party employed in this trade, shall pay no other or higher duties or charges than those of the other. The same duties of importation and of exportation shall be paid on the articles imported or exported by virtue of this article, and the same bounties allowed on their exportation, whether in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

LONDON, June 14, 1819.

I was honored, on the 8th instant, with your despatch No. 17, of the 7th of May.

On the 9th I addressed a note to Lord Castlereagh, to request an interview, that I might proceed to lay before this Government, without losing any time, the determinations to which the President had come on the important subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the West Indies. His Lordship appointed yesterday for me to wait upon him.

I commenced with calling to mind the point at which the discussion had left off upon this branch of the negotiation last Autumn, and gave a new assurance of the President's earnest desire to see this trade opened upon a footing of entire and liberal reciprocity, rather than stand any longer upon the conduct of arbitrary laws. In this spirit I was instructed to offer a projet, which had been carefully drawn up upon the basis of a compromise between the pretensions of the two parties, and which, indeed, would be found to fall in so entirely with the propositions of Great Britain, in some respects, and to make such an approximation to them in others, that a hope was cherished of its proving acceptable.

That, in particular, it would be found to adopt the description of naval stores and of lumber, as articles to be exported from the United States, upon which the British Plenipotentiaries had themselves insisted—confining the former to pitch, tar, and turpentine, and the latter to staves, headings, and shingles, contrary to the more enlarged signification which it had been the desire of the American Plenipotentiaries to give to them; that it acquiesced also in the exclusion of all salted provisions, including the important article of fish; that it, moreover, came wholly into the British views, in consenting to the exclusion of sugar and coffee as articles to be imported into the United States from the British West Indies; it being understood that the above traffic was to be opened upon equal terms, in all respects, to American and British vessels.

In return for such an accommodation to the colonial views of Great Britain, the projet asked, on the other hand, that the list of articles exportable from the United States to the West Indies should be the same as to Bermuda, and to the British North American colonies; that the articles exportable to the United States should be confined to such as were of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the above islands or colonies; and that the same duties, and no more, should be payable on importations from the United States into the West Indies, whether the articles were brought directly or indirectly, as on similar articles imported into the West Indies from any foreign country, or from any of the British colonies.

With this outline of its contents, I handed a copy of the projet which came enclosed in your despatch to his Lordship. The discussions between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Governments having recently been so ample on the matters which it embraces, I thought that nothing was likely to be gained by my leaving room for the possible hope that any of its essential provisions would be departed from. Accordingly, I deemed it best to say with candor, in the first instance, that as it was offered, so was it to be taken; for that my present instructions would admit of no deviations, unless on points verbal, or otherwise immaterial. I shall bear in mind that the parts within crotchets may be omitted. His Lordship received it with an assurance that a full and candid consideration would be given to it. The pressure of Parliamentary business might, he said, delay an attention to it for some weeks, but that at as early a day as was practicable it would be taken up. I replied, that I believed that the great object would be attained on our side if a decision were communicated to me in full time to be made known to the President before the next session of Congress. Should our propositions prove acceptable, I was empowered, I added, to make them supplementary to the convention of the 20th of October, subject always to the ratification of the Senate. I here closed, having endeavored in the course of my remarks to convey to his Lordship's mind those general reasonings applicable to our propositions which are unfolded in your despatch, and to which I shall again advert on future occasions, should it become necessary. The confidential report of the 19th of February, by the Committee of Foreign Relations in the Senate, was safely received under cover of your despatch.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, September 17, 1819.

Lord Castlereagh came to town on the 15th instant, and granted me an interview yesterday on the business of the West India trade.

Holding in his hands the proposals I had submitted, his Lordship premised that he thought it would be perhaps best for him to answer them in the same general way that the British articles, submitted through my predecessor in 1817, had been answered; that is, not in any formal manner, but merely by a word of conversation with me. I said that I was sure that the form of the answer would make no difference; its transmission to my Government, in whatever mode his Lordship might be pleased to convey it to me, would doubtless effect every substantial purpose.

In the answer there was no hesitation. Our proposals, he said, were not of a nature to form the basis of any agreement between the two countries. They would effect an entire subversion of the British colonial system: from this system they were not prepared to depart. Their colonies were, in many respects, burdensome, and even liable to involve the country in wars. Garrisons and other establishments were constantly maintained in them, at a heavy charge. In return, it was just that they should be incumbered with regulations, the operation of which might help to meet, in part, the expenses which they created. The great principle of these regulations was known to be the reservation of an exclusive right to the benefit of all their trade—a principle, of which the free-port acts had, it was true, produced some relaxation; but it had never been the intention of this Government to do any thing more than to offer to us a participation in these acts. Some modifications of them would have been acquiesced in, suggested by local causes, and an anxious desire that our two countries might come to an understanding on this part of their intercourse. But to break down the system was no part of their plan. Our proposals, therefore, could not be accepted. Such were his remarks.

I observed, that to break down the system was not our aim. All that we desired was, that the trade, as far as it was gone into at all, should be open to the vessels of both nations upon precisely equal terms. If the system fell by such an arrangement, it was as an incident, and only showed how difficult it seemed to render its long continuance consistent with a proper measure of commercial justice towards us.

So broad and unequivocal was his Lordship's refusal, that it seemed almost superfluous to ask him to be more particular; yet, perceiving in me a wish to be made acquainted rather more specifically with the objections, he said that he would not scruple to mention them without, however, entering into details, for which he was not prepared, and which had been amply unfolded on both sides during the negotiation this time twelvemonth. The objections were three-fold. First, we asked an enumeration, by name, of all the ports in the West Indies that we desired should be open to our vessels; secondly, that the trade between the United States and the British colonies on the continent of America, and with Bermuda, should be confined within the same limits as that between the United States and the West India islands direct; and, thirdly, we asked that the duties on articles imported from the United States into the islands, in American ships, should be no higher than on the same articles when imported in British ships from the United States, or from any other country, without saying foreign country. These three provisions, particularly the second and third, would form insurmountable obstacles to the conclusion of any convention which should purport to embrace them.

I contented myself with replies as general. The communications from the joint mission last year, as well as some separate ones from this legation after it was over, will have informed the President how fully the views of our Government, on the injustice of this system, in all its past effects upon us, have heretofore been stated. On this occasion I remarked, as to the first objection, that it was plain that, if the ports were not specially named, the privilege of admission to them would, at any time, be revokable whenever Great Britain thought fit to exclude from them any other foreign vessels. It would be, in short, a privilege with nothing positive or certain in its character. As to the second, I said that, should an indirect trade be opened with the islands in any greater extent than the direct trade, nothing was more clear than that the greater part, or the whole, would soon be made to flow in the channel of the former, to the manifest advantage of British bottoms. On the third objection, I said that an explanatory remark or two was all that I should add (it would be but repetition) to what had often been urged before. That we should deny to Great Britain the common right of protecting the industry of a part of her own dominions, by laying discriminating duties in its favor, might be thought, at first blush, to wear an appearance not defensible; but it would be found, on a moment's examination, to be strictly so. The system built up by Britain must be looked at altogether. It was in itself so inverted and artificial, that principles not disputed in the abstract ceased to be just when applied to it. Though one and all of these colonies were, indeed, of her dominion, yet were they made to stand, with respect to us, in the light of separate and independent countries. This was the keystone of the colonial doctrine. Why should we not, in turn, adopt and apply it to Great Britain? If we stipulated not to impose upon articles imported into the United States from the British West Indies any higher duties than upon the same articles coming from any other foreign country, a similar provision by Great Britain, to impose on articles exported from the United States to her islands no higher duties than on the same articles when brought from any other foreign country, would obviously be one of but nominal reciprocity; since, after her own dominions on the continent of America, there was no other place whence such exportations to her islands would ever be made. Thus it was that this third provision, combined with the two others, became necessary to enable the United States, whilst prosecuting a trade with the British West Indies, to place their navigation upon a footing, not of verbal merely, but of real equality. It was the latter alone that could lay the foundations of a compact between the two nations that could ever be satisfactory or lasting.

His Lordship did not hold to such views, and the conversation was not prolonged. It is proper for me to add, that he requested it to be understood that, whilst our proposals were declined, it was altogether in a friendly spirit, and that no complaint would be made, as had frequently been intimated, at our resorting to any just and rightful regulations of our own which we might deem necessary to meet theirs, in relation to these islands. I rejoined, that I thought it probable that some such regulations would, before long, in addition to those existing, be adopted.

Having earnestly endeavored to fulfil all my instructions, in their full spirit of anxiety for a different result upon this subject, my duty appears now to have arrived at its close.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 27, 1820.

I have the honor of transmitting, herewith, a copy of the laws passed at the last session of Congress, which closed on the 15th instant, among which you will find one, page 116, entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," which has an important bearing upon our commercial relations with Great Britain.

The subject to which that act relates has so recently and so fully been discussed between the two Governments, that it may be superfluous, though it cannot be unseasonable, to assure the British Cabinet, as you are authorized to do, that it was adopted with a spirit in nowise unfriendly to Great Britain; and that, if at any time the disposition should be felt there to meet this country by arrangements founded on principles of reciprocity, it will be met, on the part of the United States, with an earnest wish to substitute a system of the most liberal intercourse, instead of that of counter-prohibitions, which this act has only rendered complete.

CONVENTION WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, desirous to cement the good understanding which happily subsists between them, have for that purpose, named their respective Plenipotentiaries, that is to say: the President of the United States, on his part, has appointed Albert Gallatin, their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of France; and Richard Rush, their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of His Britannic Majesty; and His Majesty has appointed the right honorable Frederick John Robinson, treasurer of His Majesty's Navy, and president of the committee of Privy Council for trade and plantations; and Henry Goulburn, Esq., one of His Majesty's under Secretaries of State: who, after having exchanged their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ART. 1. Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty, claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Ramea islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon islands; on the shores of the Magdalen islands; and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the straits of Belleisle, and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company: and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

ART. 2. It is agreed that a line drawn from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, or, if the said point shall not be in the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, then that a line drawn from the said point due north or south, as the case may be, until the said line shall intersect the said parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the line of demarcation between the territories of the United States and those of His Britannic Majesty, and that the said line shall form the northern boundary of the said territories of the United States, and the southern boundary of the territories of His Britannic Majesty, from the Lake of the Woods to the Stony mountains.

ART. 3. It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two Powers: it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other Power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves.

ART. 4. All the provisions of the convention "to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of His Britannic Majesty," concluded at London on the third day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, with the exception of the clause which limited its duration to four years, and excepting, also, so far as the same was affected by the declaration of His Majesty respecting the island of St. Helena, are hereby extended and continued in force for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, in the same manner as if all the provisions of the said convention were herein specially recited.

ART. 5. Whereas it was agreed, by the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, that "all territory, places, and possessions, whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property." And whereas, under the aforesaid article, the United States claim for their citizens, and as their private property, the restitution of, or full compensation for, all slaves who, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty, were in any territory, places, or possessions, whatsoever, directed by the said treaty to be restored to the United States, but then still occupied by the British forces, whether such slaves were, at the date aforesaid, on shore, or on board any British vessel lying in waters within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States. And whereas differences have arisen whether, by the true intent and meaning of the aforesaid article of the Treaty of Ghent, the United States are entitled to the restitution of, or full compensation for, all or any slaves, as above described, the high contracting parties hereby agree to refer the said differences to some friendly sovereign or State, to be named for that purpose; and the high contracting parties further engage to consider the decision of such friendly Sovereign or State to be final and conclusive on all the matters referred.

ART. 6. This convention, when the same shall have been duly ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on the said United States and on His Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this date, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have hereunto affixed the seal of their arms. Done at London, this twentieth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

SPAIN—RATIFICATION OF THE CONVENTION OF 1802.

[Communicated to the House, January 5, 1819.]
To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a proclamation, dated the 22d of last month, of the convention made and concluded at Madrid, between the Plenipotentiaries of the United States and His Catholic Majesty, on the 11th of August, 1802, the ratifications of which were not exchanged till the 21st ultimo.

JAMES MONROE.

JANUARY 5, 1819.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.
A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, made and concluded at Madrid on the 11th day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, by Charles Pinckney, at that time Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Spain, and Don Pedro Cevallos, Counsellor of State, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, First Secretary of State, and Superintendent of Posts and Post Offices, fully authorized and empowered by their respective Governments, was duly ratified by the then President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, on the ninth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and was ratified by the King of Spain on the 9th day of July last past: and whereas the ratifications of the two Governments were exchanged in this city on the 21st day of December, by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, on the part of the United States, and Don Luis de Onís, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain, on the part of Spain; which convention is, word for word, as follows:

A Convention between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, for the indemnification of those who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the excesses of individuals of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the laws of nations.

His Catholic Majesty and the Government of the United States of America wishing amicably to adjust the claims which have arisen from the excesses committed during the late war by individuals of either nation, contrary to the laws of nations; or the treaty existing between the two countries, His Catholic Majesty has given, for this purpose, full powers to his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, Counsellor of State, Gentleman of the Bedchamber in employment, First Secretary of State and Universal Despatch, and Superintendent General of the Posts and Post Offices in Spain and the Indies; and the Government of the United States of America to Charles Pinckney, a citizen of the said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary near His Catholic Majesty, who have agreed as follows:

1. A Board of Commissioners shall be formed, composed of five Commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Catholic Majesty, two others by the Government of the United States, and the fifth by common consent; and in case they should not be able to agree on a person for the fifth Commissioner, each party shall name one, and leave the decision to lot; and hereafter, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence, of any of those already appointed, they shall proceed in the same manner, to the appointment of persons to replace them.

2. The appointment of the Commissioners being thus made, each one of them shall take an oath to examine, discuss, and decide, on the claims which they are to judge, according to the laws of nations and the existing treaty, and with the impartiality justice may dictate.

3. The Commissioners shall meet and hold their sessions in Madrid, where, within the term of eighteen months, (to be reckoned from the day on which they may assemble,) they shall receive all claims which, in consequence of this convention, may be made, as well by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty as by citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries, sustained by them, in consequence of the excesses committed by Spanish subjects or American citizens.

4. The Commissioners are authorized by the said contracting parties to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said demands, and to receive as worthy of credit all testimony the authenticity of which cannot reasonably be doubted.

5. From the decisions of the Commissioners there shall be no appeal, and the agreement of three of them shall give full force and effect to their decisions, as well with respect to the justice of the claims as to the amount of the indemnification which may be adjudged to the claimants; the said contracting parties obliging themselves to satisfy the said awards in specie, without deduction, at the times and places pointed out, and under the conditions which may be expressed by the Board of Commissioners.

6. It not having been possible for the said Plenipotentiaries to agree upon a mode by which the above-mentioned Board of Commissioners should arbitrate the claims originating from the excesses of foreign cruisers, agents, consuls, or tribunals, in their respective territories, which might be imputable to their two Governments, they have expressly agreed that each Government shall reserve (as it does by this convention) to itself, its subjects or citizens, respectively, all the rights which they now have, and under which they may hereafter bring forward their claims, at such times as may be most convenient to them.

7. The present convention shall have no force or effect until it be ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged as soon as possible.

In faith whereof, we, the underwritten Plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention, and have affixed thereto our respective seals. Done at Madrid this 11th day of August, 1802.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, James Monroe, President of the United States, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the City of [L. S.] Washington, this twenty-second day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and of independence the forty-third.

JAMES MONROE,

By the President:

J. Q. ADAMS.

GREAT BRITAIN—WEST INDIA TRADE.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 27, 1819.]

[The following Acts of the British Parliament were communicated to the Senate by the Committee of Foreign Relations:]

An Act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports of the West Indies. [June 27, 1805.]

Whereas, by an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, in the ports of Kingston, Savannah le Mer, Montego Bay, and Santa Lucia, in the island of Jamaica; in the port of Saint George, in the island of Granada; in the port of Rosseau, in the island of Dominica; and in the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, one of the Bahama islands;" and by several other acts passed subsequently thereto, the ports of Kingston, Savannah le Mer, Montego Bay, Santa Lucia, and Port Antonio, in the island of Jamaica; the port of Saint George, in the island of Granada; the port of Rosseau, in the island of Dominica; the port of Saint Johns, in the island of Antigua; the port of San Josef, in the island of Trinidad; the port of Scarborough, in the island of Tobago; the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, one of the Bahama islands; and the port of Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola, were opened for the importation of certain goods and merchandise, under certain regulations and restrictions; and whereas, it is expedient that such of the provisions of the said acts relating to the importation or exportation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, to or from the aforesaid ports, or any of them, or to the admission of any ships or vessels into the said ports, or any of them, or to any duties payable on such importation, exportation, or admission, as are now in force, should be consolidated into one act, and that such of the said laws as are now temporary should be made perpetual; and that, in addition to the aforesaid ports, the port of Saint Anne, in the island of Jamaica; the port of Pittstown, in Portland harbor, in Crooked Island, another of the Bahama islands; the port of Kingston, in the island of Saint Vincent; and the principal port in the island of Bermuda, should be opened under certain regulations and restrictions. May it, therefore, please your Majesty that it may be enacted, and

Be it enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, wool, cotton wool, indigo, cochineal, drugs of all sorts, cocoa, logwood, fustic, and all sorts of wood for dyers' use, hides, skins, and tallow, beaver, and all sorts of furs, tortoise-shell, hard wood, or mill-timber, mahogany, and all other woods for cabinet ware, horses, asses, mules, and cattle, being the growth, or pro- duction of any of the colonies or plantations in America, or of any country on the continent of America belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, and all coin and bullion, diamonds and precious stones, may be imported from any of the said countries into the several ports of Kingston, Savannah le Mer, Montego Bay, Santa Lucia, Antonia, and Saint Anne, in the island of Jamaica; the port of Saint George, in the island of Granada; the port of Rosseau, in the island of Dominica; the port of St. John's, in the island of Antigua; the port of San Josef, in the island of Trinidad; the port of Scarborough, in the island of Tobago; the port of Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola; the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, one of the Bahama islands; the port of Pittstown, in Portland harbor, in Crooked Island, another of the Bahama islands; the port of Kingston, in the island of Saint Vincent; and the principal port in the island of Bermuda, in any foreign sloop, schooner, or other vessel whatever, not having more than one deck, and being owned and navigated by persons inhabiting any of the said colonies or plantations in America, or countries on the continent of America belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, tobacco, being the growth or production of any island in the West Indies, or of any country on the continent of America belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, may be imported from any of the said islands or countries into any of the said ports hereinbefore enumerated, in the like foreign ships and vessels, and be again exported from thence to any part of the United Kingdom, under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, and subject to the like penalties and forfeitures as are in this act mentioned and contained, with regard to the goods, wares, and merchandise, hereinbefore enumerated.

5. And be it further enacted, That all such tobacco so imported into any of the said ports shall, when imported into any part of the United Kingdom from any of the said ports, pay the same duties of customs and excise, and none other, as tobacco the growth or production of any of His Majesty's plantations in the West Indies, or of the territories of the United States of America, and be subject to the same rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions, and be liable to the same forfeitures and penalties for the breach thereof.

4. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful, from and after the passing of this act, to import into the said port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, and into the said port of Pittstown, in Portland harbor, in Crooked Island, and into such other port or ports in the said Bahama islands, and into the principal port in the island of Bermuda, and into such port or ports in the islands called Caicos, as shall be approved by His Majesty in Council: sugar and coffee, the produce of any foreign country or plantation, in such foreign ships or vessels, and subject to such rules, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed in this act with respect to the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinbefore enumerated.

5. And be it further enacted, That sugar and coffee which shall be imported into the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, or the port of Pittstown, in Crooked Island, or into such port or ports in the said Bahama islands, or into the principal port in the island of Bermuda, or into any such port or ports in the said islands called Caicos, as have been, or may hereafter be, approved by His Majesty in Council, may be imported into and again exported from any of the said ports, without payment of any duties of customs whatever, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

6. And be it further enacted, That, on the importation of any sugar or coffee into any part of the United Kingdom from the said port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, or the said port of Pittstown, in Crooked Island, or such other port or ports in the Bahama islands, or the island of Bermuda, or any such ports in the said islands called Caicos, such sugar or coffee shall, respectively, be deemed to be not of the British plantations, and shall be liable to, and shall pay, duty of customs and excise as such, and may be warehoused in like manner, and shall be subject to the regulations of any act or acts of Parliament in force at the time of importation of such sugar or coffee, so far as they relate to sugar or coffee not of the British plantations.

7. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no goods, wares, or merchandise, except such as are hereinbefore enumerated, shall be imported in any foreign ship, sloop, schooner, or vessel whatever, from any of the colonies or plantations in America, or any countries on the continent of America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, into any of the before-mentioned ports, upon any pretence whatever, upon pain of forfeiting the same, together with the ship, sloop, schooner, or vessel in which the same shall be imported, and the guns, tackle, apparel, and furniture of such ship, sloop, schooner, or vessel; and, in every such case, the same shall and may be seized by any officer or officers of His Majesty's customs or navy, who are or shall be authorized or empowered to make seizures in cases of forfeiture, and shall and may be prosecuted in such manner as hereinafter directed.

8. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful, from and after the passing of this act, to export from any of the said ports to any of the colonies or plantations in America, or any countries on the continent of America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, in any sloop, schooner, or other vessel whatever, not having more than one deck, and being owned and navigated by persons inhabiting any such colony, plantation, or country, rum of the produce of any British island, and also negroes who shall have been brought into the said islands, respectively, in British built ships, owned, navigated, and registered according to law; and all manner of goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been legally imported into the said islands, respectively, except masts, yards, or bowsprits, pitch, tar, and turpentine, and also except such iron as shall have been brought from the British colonies or plantations in America, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

9. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful to export, in any British ship or vessel, owned and navigated according to law, from any of the said islands in this act enumerated to any British colony or plantation in America or the West Indies, any goods or commodities whatever of the manufacture of Europe, and also any goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been legally imported into any of the said islands from any of the colonies or plantations in America or any country on the continent of America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State.

10. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That, if any doubts shall arise whether any such goods, wares, or merchandise, intended to be so exported, shall have been legally imported into the said islands, respectively, in this act enumerated, the legality of such importation shall be made appear to the satisfaction of the collector and comptroller, or other principal officer of the customs at the port of exportation, before such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be suffered to be shipped for exportation.

11. And it is hereby further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, all wool, cotton wool, indigo, cochineal, drugs of all sorts, cocoa, logwood, fustic, and all sorts of wood for dyers' use, hides, skins, and tallow, beaver, and all sorts of furs, tortoise-shell, mahogany, and all other woods for cabinet ware, of the growth or production of any of the colonies or plantations in America, or countries on the continent of America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, shall be allowed to be exported from any of the said islands in this act enumerated to any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, under the rules, regulations, securities, restrictions, penalties, and forfeitures, particularly mentioned and provided in an act of Parliament made in the twelfth year of the reign of King Charles II., entitled "An act for encouraging and increasing shipping and navigation," and in another act of Parliament made in the twenty-second and twenty-third years of the reign of King Charles II., entitled "An act to prevent the planting of tobacco in England, and for regulating the plantation trade," and in another act of Parliament made in the twentieth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to allow the trade between Ireland and the British colonies and plantations in America and the West Indies and the British settlement on the coast of Africa to be carried on in like manner as it is now carried on between Great Britain and the said colonies and settlements," or in any of the said acts with respect to the goods, wares, and merchandise, therein enumerated or described.

12. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no goods or commodities whatever, of the growth, production, or manufacture of the East Indies, or other places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, shall, upon any pretence whatever, be exported from any of the ports enumerated in this act, to any other British colony or plantation in America or the West Indies, upon pain of forfeiting such goods or commodities, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall be so exported, and the guns, tackle, apparel, and furniture of such ship or vessel.

13. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, if any foreign ship or vessel as aforesaid, arriving at or in any of the aforesaid ports, shall have on board any goods or commodities whatever of the growth, production, or manufacture of the East Indies, or other places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, such goods or commodities shall be forfeited, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall be brought, and all her guns, ammunition, tackle, and apparel, whether such goods or commodities shall be intended to be landed or not, or whether bulk shall have been broken or not.

14. And be it further enacted, That no duty of gunpowder, nor any fee or reward whatever, shall be demanded, taken, or received by any officer or officers whatever in the said islands, respectively, in this act enumerated, for any entry, cocket, clearance, or passport, for any foreign ship or vessel, or for any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into or exported from the said islands, respectively, in such foreign ships or vessels, under the like pains and penalties as are inflicted upon officers exacting or receiving greater fees than are allowed by any act or acts of Parliament now in force for regulating the fees of the officers of the customs in His Majesty's colonies and plantations in America.

15. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures imposed by this act shall and may be respectively prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided, in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of His Majesty's colonies or islands in America, in the same manner and form, and by the same rules and regulations in all respects, in so far as the same are applicable, as any other penalties and forfeitures imposed by any act or acts of Parliament made for the security of the revenue of the customs, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, or for the regulation of trade or navigation, and which were in force immediately before the passing of this act, may be respectively prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided, in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of His Majesty's colonies or islands in America.

16. And be it further enacted, That all such clauses, provisions, articles, matters, and things, in any former act or acts of Parliament contained, as relate to the opening and establishing any ports in the islands hereinbefore mentioned, or any of them, for the more free importation and exportation of the goods, wares, and merchandise in this act enumerated, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

An Act to permit the importation of rice, grain, and flour from any foreign colonies on the continent of America into certain ports in the West Indies, and to allow certain articles to be imported from the United States of America into the British provinces in North America, for the purpose of exportation to the British islands in the West Indies. [June 30, 1808.]

Whereas, by an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled An act for regulating the trade between the subjects of His Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands, and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between His Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies, it is enacted, that it shall and may be lawful in certain cases for any of the Governors of the provinces in British North America, therein enumerated, with the advice and consent of their respective councils, to authorize the importation of certain articles, for a limited time, from any of the territories belonging to the United States of America, for the supply of the inhabitants of the said provinces, respectively: and whereas it is expedient that the importation of such articles should be allowed for the purpose of supplying other of His Majesty's colonies than are therein mentioned:

Be it enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall and may be lawful for any of the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or Commander-in-Chief for the time being, of the provinces of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or of the islands of Cape Breton or St. John's, with the advice and consent of their respective councils, to authorize the importation of the articles enumerated in the said recited act for a limited time, from any of the territories of the United States of America, for the purpose of the same being re-exported to any other of His Majesty's colonies or plantations.

2. And whereas it is provided by an act passed in the forty-fifth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled An act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports in the West Indies, that certain articles therein enumerated may be imported into the several ports therein named from foreign colonies in the West Indies, and it is expedient that the permission for such importation should be extended: Be it enacted, That, in addition to the articles enumerated in the said act, it shall be lawful to import, under the like authority, restrictions, rules, regulations, penalties, and forfeitures provided in the said recited act, the articles of rice, grain of all sorts, and flour, from any colonies or plantations in America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, into any of the free ports in colonies or plantations belonging to His Majesty in the West Indies, which are particularly named in the said act, or in another act passed in the forty-seventh year of His Majesty, respecting the port of Amsterdam, in the island of Curaçoa, in any foreign ship, schooner, or other foreign vessel whatever, not having more than one deck, and being manned and navigated by persons inhabiting any of the said colonies or plantations belonging to any foreign Sovereign or State.

An Act to allow British plantation sugar and coffee, imported into Bermuda in British ships, to be exported to the territories of the United States of America in foreign ships or vessels, and to permit articles the production of the said United States to be imported into the said island in foreign ships or vessels. [July 1, 1812.]

Whereas it is expedient to allow sugar and coffee, the produce of any British colony or plantation in the West Indies, imported into the island of Bermuda in British ships or vessels, to be exported from the port of Saint George, in the said island, to the territories of the United States of America, in foreign ships or vessels; and to allow certain articles of the growth or production of the territories of the said United States to be imported into the said island in foreign ships or vessels, and to be re-exported from thence in British built ships or vessels, to British islands in the West Indies:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in the present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall be lawful for sugar and coffee, the produce of any British colony or plantation in the West Indies, imported into the island of Bermuda in any British ship or vessel, to be exported from the port of St. George in the said island of Bermuda, to any part of the territories of the United States of America, in any foreign ship or vessel belonging to any country in amity with His Majesty, above the burden of sixty tons, any law now in force to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to import tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, staves, heading-boards, and plank, timber, shingles, and lumber of any sort, horses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, and live stock of any sort, bread, biscuit, flour, pease, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, and grain of any sort, such commodities being of the growth or production of the territories belonging the United States of America, from the said territories to the port of St. George, in the island of Bermuda, in any foreign ship or vessel belonging to any country in amity with His Majesty, anything in an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of His present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for regulating the trade between the subjects of His Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands, and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between His Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies," or in any other act to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any of His Majesty's subjects to export any of the articles before enumerated, which shall have been imported in any foreign ship or vessel from the territories of the United States into the island of Bermuda from said port of St. George to any of His Majesty's islands or dominions in the West Indies, in British built ships and vessels, owned and navigated according to law.

[By a subsequent act, the port of Hamilton is placed on the same situation as the port of Saint George.]

An Act to permit the importation of certain articles into His Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies, or on the continent of South America; and also certain articles into certain ports in the West Indies. [May 23, 1818.]

Whereas it is expedient to allow the importation of certain articles into His Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies, or on the continent of South America:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall and may be lawful to import tobacco, rice, grain, pease, beans, and flour, into any of His Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies, or on the continent of South America, for the supply of the inhabitants thereof, in British built ships, owned, registered, and navigated according to law, from any colony or possession in the West Indies, or on the continent of America, under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State.

2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to import pease and beans, being the growth or production of any of the colonies or possessions in the West Indies, or on the continent of America, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, into any of the ports in His Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies, enumerated in an act passed in the forty-fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled an act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports in the West Indies; and in another act, passed in the forty-sixth year of the reign of his said Majesty, entitled an act for enabling His Majesty to permit the importation and exportation of certain goods and commodities into and from the port of Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola; and likewise in another act, passed in the forty-ninth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled an act for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and commodities into and from the port of Falmouth, in the island of Jamaica; and in another act, passed in the fifty-second year of his said Majesty's reign, entitled an act for allowing certain articles to be imported into the Bahama islands, and exported therefrom in foreign vessels, and for encouraging the exportation of salt from the said islands; and in another act, passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said Majesty, entitled an act to extend several acts for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise to Porto Maria, in the island of Jamaica, and to the port of Bridgetown, in the island of Barbadoes, in vessels of the like description, and subject to the like rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are required by the aforesaid acts permitting certain articles to be imported into the ports enumerated therein, and in vessels of the like description, and subject to the like rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are required in an act passed in the fiftieth year of his said Majesty's reign, entitled an act for amending, and continuing so amended until the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, an act of the forty-fifth year of his present Majesty, for consolidating and extending the several laws in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports in the West Indies, which was afterwards continued by an act passed in the fifty-second year of his said Majesty's reign, until the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and revived and made perpetual by another act passed in the fifty-fourth year of the reign of his said Majesty, entitled an act to revive and make perpetual certain acts for consolidating and extending the several laws in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain ports in the West Indies.

INDEPENDENT GOVERNMENTS OF SOUTH AMERICA.

[Communicated to the House, January 30, 1819.]

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1819.

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in compliance with their resolution of the 14th of this month, a report from the Secretary of State concerning the applications which have been made by any of the independent Governments of South America to have a Minister or Consul General accredited by the Government of the United States, with the answers of this Government to the applications addressed to it.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 28, 1819.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th instant, requesting of the President information whether any application has been made by any of the independent Governments of South America to have a Minister or Consul General accredited by the Government of the United States, and what was the answer given to such application, has the honor of submitting copies of applications made by Don Lino de Clemente to be received as the representative of the Republic of Venezuela; and of David C. De Forest, a citizen of the United States, to be accredited as Consul General of the United Provinces of South America, with the answers respectively returned to them. The reply of Mr. De Forest is likewise enclosed, and copies of the papers, signed and avowed by Mr. Clemente which the President considered as rendering any communication between this Department and him, other than that now enclosed, improper.

It is to be observed that, while Mr. Clemente, in March, 1817, was assuming, with the name of deputy from Venezuela, to exercise with the United States powers transcending the lawful authority of any ambassador, and while, in January, 1818, he was commissioning, in language disrespectful to this Government, Vicente Pazos, in the name of the Republic of Venezuela, to "protest against the invasion of Amelia Island, and all such further acts of the Government of the United States as were contrary to the rights and interests of the several republics and the persons sailing under their respective flags duly commissioned," he had himself not only never been received by the Government of the United States as deputy from Venezuela, but had never presented himself to it in that character, or offered to exhibit any evidence whatsoever of his being invested with it. The issuing of commissions authorizing acts of war against a foreign nation is a power which not even a sovereign can lawfully exercise within the dominions of another in amity with him, without his consent. Mr. Pazos, in his memorial to the President, communicating the commission signed by Mr. Clemente at Philadelphia, and given to General McGregor, alleges, in its justification, the example of the illustrious Franklin in Europe; but this example, instead of furnishing an exception, affords a direct confirmation of the principle now advanced. The commissions issued by the diplomatic agents of the United States in France, during our Revolutionary war, were granted with the knowledge and consent of the French Government, of which the following resolution from the Secret Journal of Congress of 23d December, 1776, is decisive proof:

"Resolved, That the commissioners [at the Court of France] be authorized to arm and fit for war any number of vessels, not exceeding six, at the expense of the United States, to war upon British property; and that commissions and warrants be for this purpose sent to the commissioners: provided the commissioners be well satisfied this measure will not be disagreeable to the Court of France."

It is also now ascertained, by the express declaration of the Supreme Chief, Bolivar, to the agent of the United States at Angostura, "that the Government of Venezuela had never authorized the expedition of General McGregor, nor any other enterprise, against Florida or Amelia." Instructions have been forwarded to the same agent to give suitable explanations to the Government of Venezuela of the motives for declining further communication with Mr. Clemente, and assurances that it will readily be held with any person not liable to the same or like objection.

The application of Mr. De Forest to be accredited as Consul General of the United Provinces of South America was first made in May last; his credential was a letter from the Supreme Director of Buenos Ayres, Pueyrredon, announcing his appointment by virtue of articles concluded in the names of the United States of America and of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, between persons authorized by him, and W. G. D. Worthington, as agent of this Government, who neither had, nor indeed pretended to have, any power to negotiate such articles. Mr. De Forest was informed, and requested to make known to the Supreme Director, that Mr. Worthington had no authority whatsoever to negotiate on the part of the United States any articles to be obligatory on them, and had never pretended to possess any full power to that effect; that any communication interesting to the Supreme Director, or to the people of Buenos Ayres, would readily be held with Mr. De Forest; but that the recognition of him as a Consul General from the United Provinces of South America could not be granted, either upon the stipulation of supposed articles, which were a nullity, or upon the commission or credential letter of the Supreme Director, without recognising thereby the authority from which it emanated as a sovereign and independent Power.

With this determination, Mr. De Forest then declared himself entirely satisfied. But, shortly after the commencement of the present session of Congress, he renewed his solicitations, by the note dated the 9th of December, to be accredited as the Consul General of the United Provinces of South America, founding his claim on the credentials from his Government, which had been laid before the President last May.

A conversation was shortly afterwards held with him, by direction of the President, in which the reasons were fully explained to him upon which the formal acknowledgment of the Government of Buenos Ayres for the present was not deemed expedient. They were also, at his request, generally stated in the note dated the 31st of December.

It has not been thought necessary, on the part of this Government, to pursue the correspondence with Mr. De Forest any further, particularly as he declares himself unauthorized to agitate or discuss the question with regard to the recognition of Buenos Ayres as an independent nation. Some observations, however, may be proper, with reference to circumstances alleged by him, as arguing that a Consul General may be accredited without acknowledging the independence of the Government from which he has his appointment. The Consul of the United States, who has resided at Buenos Ayres, had no other credential than his commission. It implied no recognition by the United States of any particular Government; and it was issued before the Buenos Ayrean declaration of independence, and while all the acts of the authorities there were in the name of the King of Spain.

During the period while this Government declined to receive Mr. Onis as the Minister of Spain, no Consul received an exequatur under a commission from the same authority. The Spanish Consuls, who had been received before the contest for the Government of Spain had arisen, were suffered to continue the exercise of their functions, for which no new recognition was necessary. A similar remark may be made with regard to the inequality alleged by Mr. De Forest to result from the admission of Spanish Consuls officially to protest before our judicial tribunals the rights of Spanish subjects generally, while he is not admitted to the same privileges with regard to those of the citizens of Buenos Ayres. The equality of rights to which the two parties to a civil war are entitled, in their relations with neutral Powers, does not extend to the rights enjoyed by one of them, by virtue of treaty stipulations contracted before the war; neither can it extend to rights, the enjoyment of which essentially depends upon the issue of the war. That Spain is a sovereign and independent Power, is not contested by Buenos Ayres, and is recognised by the United States, who are bound by treaty to receive her Consuls. Mr. De Forest's credential letter asks that he may be received by virtue of a stipulation in supposed articles concluded by Mr. Worthington, but which he was not authorized to make; so that the reception of Mr. De Forest, upon the credential on which he founds his claim, would imply a recognition, not only of the Government of the Supreme Director, Pueyrredon, but a compact as binding upon the United States, which is a mere nullity.

Consuls are, indeed, received by the Government of the United States from acknowledged sovereign Powers with whom they have no treaty. But the exequatur for a Consul General can obviously not be granted without recognising the authority from whom his appointment proceeds as Sovereign. "The Consul," says Vattel, (book 2, chap. 2, § 34,) "is not a public Minister; but as he is charged with a commission from his Sovereign, and received in that quality by him where he resides, he should enjoy, to a certain extent, the protection of the law of nations."

If, from this state of things, the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres cannot enjoy the advantage of being officially represented before the courts of the United States by a Consul, while the subjects of Spain are entitled to that privilege, it is an inequality resulting from the nature of the contest in which they are engaged, and not from any denial of their rights as parties to a civil war. The recognition of them, as such, and the consequent admission of their vessels into the ports of the United States, operate with an inequality against the other party to that contest, and in their favor.

It was stated in conversation to Mr. De Forest, and afterwards in the note of 31st December, that it would be desirable to the United States to understand whether Buenos Ayres itself claims an entire, or only an imperfect independence; that the necessity of an explanation upon this point arose from the fact that, in the negotiation of the supposed article with Mr. Worthington, the Supreme Director had declined contracting the engagement, though with the offer of reciprocity, that the United States should enjoy at Buenos Ayres the advantages and privileges of the most favored nation; that the reason given by him for refusing such an engagement was, that Spain having claims of sovereignty over Buenos Ayres, the right must be reserved of granting special favors to her for renouncing them, which other nations, having no such claims to renounce, could not justly expect to obtain. Without discussing the correctness of this principle, it was observed that the United States, in acknowledging Buenos Ayres as independent, would expect to be treated on the footing of the most favored nation, or to know the extent and character of the benefits which were to be allowed to others and denied to them; and that, while an indefinite power should be reserved, of granting to any nation advantages to be withheld from the United States, an acknowledgment of independence must be considered premature.

Mr. De Forest answers that this reservation must appear to every one contrary to the inclination as well as the interest of the Government of Buenos Ayres; that it must have been only a proposition of a temporary nature, not extending to the acknowledgment by the United States of the independence of South America, which he is confident would have rendered any such reservation altogether unnecessary, in the opinion of the Government of Buenos Ayres, who must have seen they were treating with an unauthorized person, and suggested the idea from an opinion of its good policy; and, he adds, that Portugal is acknowledged by the United States as an independent Power, although their commerce is taxed higher in the ports of Brazil than that of Great Britain.

It had not been intended to suggest to Mr. De Forest that it was, in any manner, incompatible with the independence or sovereignty of a nation to grant commercial advantages to one foreign State, and to withhold them from another. If any such advantage is granted for an equivalent, other nations can have no right to claim its enjoyment, even though entitled to be treated as the most favored nations, unless by the reciprocal grant of the same equivalent. Neither had it been meant to say that a nation forfeited its character of acknowledged sovereignty, even by granting, without equivalent, commercial advantages to one foreign Power, and withholding them from another. However absurd and unjust the policy of a nation granting to one, and refusing to another, such gratuitous concessions might be deemed, the question whether they affected its independence or not would rest upon the nature of the concessions themselves. The idea meant to be conveyed was, that the reservation of an indefinite right to grant hereafter special favors to Spain for the remuneration of her claims of sovereignty, left it uncertain whether the independence of Buenos Ayres would be complete or imperfect, and it was suggested with a view to give the opportunity to the Supreme Director of explaining his intentions in this respect, and to intimate to him that, while such an indefinite right was reserved, an acknowledgment of independence must be considered as premature. This caution was thought the more necessary, inasmuch as it was known that, at the same time while the Supreme Director was insisting upon this reservation, a mediation between Spain and her colonies had been solicited by Spain, and agreed to by the five principal Powers of Europe, the basis of which was understood to be a compromise between the Spanish claim to sovereignty and the colonial claim to independence.

Mr. De Forest was understood to have said that the Congress at Tucuman had determined to offer a grant of special privileges to the nation which should be the first to acknowledge the independence of Buenos Ayres. He stated in his notes that he knew nothing of any such resolution by that Congress, but that it was a prevailing opinion at Buenos Ayres, and his own opinion also, that such special privileges would be granted to the first recognising Power, if demanded. It has invariably been avowed by the Government of the United States that they would neither ask nor accept of any special privilege or advantage for their acknowledgment of South American independence; but it appears that the Supreme Director of Buenos Ayres, far from being prepared to grant special favors to the United States for taking the lead in the acknowledgment, declined even a reciprocal stipulation that they should enjoy the same advantages as other nations. Nor was this reservation, as Mr. De Forest supposes, defeasible by the acknowledgment on the part of the United States of South American independence. The Supreme Director could not be so ignorant that it was impossible for this Government to ratify the articles prepared by his authority with Mr. Worthington, and yet to withhold the acknowledgment of independence. He knew that, if that instrument should be ratified, the United States must thereby necessarily be the first to grant the acknowledgment; yet he declined inserting in it an article securing to each party in the ports of the other the advantages of the most favored nation. It is, nevertheless, in conformity to one of those same articles that Mr. De Forest claimed to be received in the formal character of Consul General.

With regard to the irregularities and excesses committed by armed vessels sailing under the flag of Buenos Ayres, complained of in the note of the 1st of January, it was not expected that Mr. De Forest would have the power of restraining them, otherwise than by representing them to the Supreme Director, in whom the authority to apply the proper remedy is supposed to be vested. The admission of Mr. De Forest in the character of Consul General would give him no additional means of suppressing the evil. Its principal aggravation arises from the circumstance that the cruisers of Buenos Ayres are almost, if not quite, universally manned and officered by foreigners, having no permanent connexion with that country, or interest in its cause. But the complaint was not confined to the misconduct of the cruisers; it was stated that blank commissions for privateers, their commanders and officers, had been transmitted to this country, with the blanks left to be filled up here, for fitting out, arming, and equipping them for purposes prohibited by the laws of the United States, and in violation of the laws of nations. It was observed, that this practice being alike irreconcilable with the rights and the obligations of the United States, it was expected by the President that, being made known to the Supreme Director, no instance of it would again occur hereafter. No reply to this part of the note has been made by Mr. De Forest; for it is not supposed that he meant to disclaim all responsibility of himself or of the Government of Buenos Ayres concerning it, unless his character of Consul General should be recognised. As he states that he has transmitted a copy of the note itself to Buenos Ayres, the expectation may be indulged that the exclusive sovereign authority of the United States within their own jurisdiction will hereafter be respected.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Dec. 16, 1818.

SIR: Your note of the 11th instant has been laid before the President of the United States, by whose direction I have to inform you that your name having been avowedly affixed to a paper, drawn up within the United States, purporting to be a commission to a foreign officer for undertaking and executing an expedition in violation of the laws of the United States, and also to another paper avowing that act, and otherwise insulting to this Government, which papers have been transmitted to Congress by the Message of the President of the 25th of March last, I am not authorized to confer with you, and that no further communication will be received from you at this Department.

I am, with due consideration, sir, your very obedient servant,

No. 1. Translation of Sir Gregor McGregor's commission.

The Deputies of free America, resident in the United States of the North, to their compatriot Gregor McGregor, General of Brigade in the service of the United Provinces of New Granada and Venezuela, greeting:

Whereas it is highly important to the interests of the people whom we have the honor to represent, that possession should be taken, without loss of time, of East and West Florida, and the blessings of free institutions and the security of their natural rights imparted to their inhabitants, in pursuance of our instructions, and in conformity to the desires of our respective Governments, we have commissioned Brigadier General Gregor McGregor for the purpose of carrying into execution, either wholly or in part, an enterprise so interesting to the glorious cause in which we are engaged:

Therefore, taking into consideration your zeal and devotion to the Republic, we request you, in the name of our constituents, to proceed, on your own responsibility and that of the above-named provinces to adopt such measures as in your judgment may most effectually tend to procure for our brethren of both the Floridas, East and West, the speedy enjoyment of those benefits to which they are invited by the importance of their geographical situation; and for that purpose we authorize you, without departing from the usages and customs of civilized nations in like cases, and the due observance of the laws of the United States, and particularly those regulating their neutrality with foreign Powers, to cause vessels to be armed without the limits of their jurisdiction, and provisionally to grant rank to naval and military officers, until the Government to be established by the free will of the said people can provide in the most suitable mode for the arrangement of their several departments; in the execution of all which, the instructions delivered to you of this date will serve as your guide.

Signed, sealed, and delivered, at the city of Philadelphia, the 31st of March, 1817.

LINO DE CLEMENTE,
Deputy for Venezuela.

From Don Lino de Clemente to Don Vincente Pazos.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 15, 1818—8th.

By letters from General Don Luis de Aury and Don Pedro Gual, dated at Fernandina, the 26th December last, I have been informed that they have commissioned you, for the purpose of presenting to the President of the United States, a protest in the name of the Independent Government of South America, against the invasion of Amelia Island by a naval and military force of the United States, on the 23d of December last, and to demand the restitution of the vessels captured from the enemy, which have been detained, and sent to different ports by American vessels of war.

Although the Government of Venezuela, of whose powers I am bearer, is included in your commission jointly with those in whose name possession was taken of Amelia Island, yet it has seemed to me to be proper specially to authorize you, as I do hereby, to protest, in the name of my said Government, against the invasion of Amelia, and all such further acts of the Government of the United States as are contrary to the rights and interests of the several republics, and the persons sailing under their respective flags, duly commissioned.

And to enable you satisfactorily to prove that Amelia Island was taken from the Spaniards by a competent authority, I enclose a copy of the commission granted to General McGregor on the 31st of March last by the deputies of the independent republics.

The motives alleged by the Government of the United States, in justification of their hostile measure, serve to prove their own futility, and clearly demonstrate that the sole object was the acquisition of the Floridas, without forming any other calculations than those founded on the more or less exhausted state to which the patriots may reduce the Spanish Government; and, in consequence, the pretext of a want of authority in the parties who took possession of Amelia and Galveston, was one while resorted to; and, at others, that those establishments were formed to serve as a shelter to pirates and smugglers; finally, that no foreign Power could be permitted to establish itself in the Floridas, alleging a secret act passed in 1811, which is applicable to the present case.

I flatter myself it will be very easy for you to prove that the United States have no other grounds for this step than their own convenience, supported by force.

I have repeatedly transmitted an account to my Government of the occurrences at Amelia Island, after its occupation by General McGregor, requesting it to communicate the same to the Government of New Granada, at Casanare; and to enable me to continue my communications, which existing circumstances make interesting, I request, sir, you will be pleased to inform me, as speedily as possible, of the result of your mission.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

LINO DE CLEMENTE.

GEORGETOWN, Dec. 9, 1818.

I have the honor to announce to Mr. Adams that I have again arrived in this District, in order to renew my solicitations to be accredited by this Government as the Consul General of the United Provinces of South America, founding my claim on the credentials from my Government, which were laid before the President in the month of May last.

The information recently acquired by this Government respecting the provinces of South America, I presume has established the fact beyond a doubt, that Buenos Ayres, their capital, and a large proportion of their territory, are and have been free and independent of the Government of Spain for more than eight years, and possess ample ability to support their independence in future; that a regular system of government is established by their inhabitants, who show themselves, by the wisdom of their institutions, sufficiently enlightened for self-government; and that they look up to this great Republic as a model, and their elder sister, from whose sympathies and friendship they hope and expect ordinary protection at least.

The messages of the President of the United States, as well the last as the present year, have created a general belief that the United States have placed us on an equal footing with Spain, as it respects our commercial operations; but, sir, it is found not to be the case. A Consul of Spain is known and respected as such by your tribunals of justice, which enables him, ex officio, to protect and defend the interests of his countrymen; whereas the verbal permission I have to act in the duties of my office will not avail in your tribunals; and a number of instances have already occurred, where the property of my absent fellow-citizens has been jeopardized for want of a legally authorized protector. The case of the Spanish schooner —, a prize to our armed vessels Buenos Ayres and Tucuman, which was brought into Scituate, some time since, by her mutinous crew, after having murdered the captain and mate, by throwing them overboard, is a striking instance of the necessity of there being resident here an accredited agent to superintend the commercial concerns of South America, and without such accredited agent our citizens cannot be considered as completely protected in their rights.

I request you, sir, to lay this communication before the President of the United States as early as it may be convenient, and to assure him that I duly appreciate the friendly reception I met with from his Government on my arrival in this country; and that, as circumstances have since materially altered, I have no doubt but I shall receive his permission to act in the accustomed form.

While I remain, with the highest consideration and respect, your most obedient servant,

DAVID C. DE FOREST.

HON. J. Q. ADAMS, Sec. of State.

No. 6.

Mr. De Forest to the Secretary of State.

GEORGETOWN, December 12, 1818.

I took the liberty on the 9th instant of addressing a note to Mr. Secretary Adams, requesting to be accredited as the Consul General of the United Provinces of South America; and have now the honor of informing Mr. Adams that I have lately received an official communication from the Government of Buenos Ayres directing me to inform the Government of this country that the supposed conspiracy against the person of the Supreme Director proves to have originated with an obscure and disappointed individual, who, to gain adherents, pretended to be connected with people of the first respectability and influence, several of whom he named, but who have convinced the Government that they had no knowledge whatever of his base project.

The Supreme Director, anxious to do away any unfavorable impressions which the report of such an affair might cause at this distance, has ordered me to assure the President of the United States that the Government of South America was never more firmly supported, nor its prospects more brilliant, than at the present time.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, with every sentiment of respect and esteem, Mr. Adams's most obedient and most humble servant,

DAVID C. DE FOREST.

HON. JOHN Q. ADAMS, Sec. of State.

No. 7.

Mr. Adams to Mr. De Forest.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31, 1818.

Mr. Adams presents his compliments to Mr. De Forest, and has the honor of assuring him, by direction of the President of the United States, of the continued interest that he takes in the welfare and prosperity of the provinces of La Plata, and of his disposition to recognise the independent Government of Buenos Ayres as soon as the time shall have arrived when the step may be taken with advantage to the interests of South America as well as of the United States.

In the mean time, he regrets that an exequatur to Mr. De Forest, as Consul General of the United Provinces of South America, cannot be issued, for reasons stated in part by the President, in his Message to Congress at the commencement of their present session; and further explained to Mr. De Forest by Mr. Adams, in the conversation which he has had the honor of holding with him. Mr. De Forest must have seen that any privileges which may be attached to the consular character cannot avail, in the judicial tribunals of this country, to influence in any manner the administration of justice; and, with regard to the schooner brought into Scituate, such measures have been taken, and will be taken, by the authorities of the United States, as are warranted by the circumstances of the case and by the existing laws.

With respect to the acknowledgment of the Government of Buenos Ayres, it has been suggested to Mr. De Forest, that, when adopted, it will be merely the recognition of a fact, without pronouncing or implying an opinion with regard to the extent of the territory or provinces under their authority, and particularly without being understood to decide upon their claim to control over the Banda Oriental, Santa Fe, Paraguay, or any other provinces disclaiming their supremacy or dominion. It was also observed that in acknowledging that Government as independent, it would be necessary for the United States to understand whether Buenos Ayres claims itself an entire, or only an imperfect independence. From certain transactions between persons authorized by the Supreme Director, and an agent of the United States, (though unauthorized by their Government,) after the declaration of independence by the Congress at Tucuman, and within the last year, it appears that the Supreme Director declined contracting the engagement that the United States should hereafter enjoy at Buenos Ayres the advantages and privileges of the most favored nation, although with the offer of a reciprocal stipulation on the part of the United States. The reason assigned by the Supreme Director was, that Spain having claims to the sovereignty of Buenos Ayres, special privileges and advantages might ultimately be granted to the Spanish nation as a consideration for the renunciation of those claims. It is desirable that it should be submitted to the consideration of the Government of Buenos Ayres whether, while such a power is reserved, their independence is complete; and how far other Powers can rely that the authority of Spain might not be eventually restored. It has been stated by Mr. De Forest that the Congress at Tucuman had passed a resolution to offer special advantages to the nation which should first acknowledge their independence; upon which the question was proposed whether such a resolution, if carried into effect, would not be rather a transfer of dependence from one nation to another, than the establishment of independence? rather to purchase support than to obtain recognition? The United States have no intention of exacting favors of Buenos Ayres for the acknowledgment of its independence; but, in acknowledging it, they will expect either to enjoy, in their intercourse with it, the same privileges and advantages as other foreign nations, or to know precisely the extent and character of the benefits which are to be allowed to others, and denied to them. It should, indeed, be known to the Supreme Director that, while such an indefinite power is reserved, of granting to any nation advantages to be withheld from the United States, an acknowledgment of independence must be considered premature.

In adverting to these principles, it was observed to Mr. De Forest that their importance could not but be peculiarly felt by the United States, as having been invariably and conspicuously exemplified in their own practice, both in relation to the country whose colonies they had been, and to that which was the first to acknowledge their independence. In the words of their declaration, issued on the 4th of July, 1776, they resolved thenceforth "to hold the British nation, as they hold the rest of mankind—enemies in war, in peace friends;" and in the treaty of amity and commerce, concluded on the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, being the first acknowledgment by a foreign Power of the independence of the United States, and the first treaty to which they were a party, the preamble declares that the King of France and the United States, "willing to fix, in an equitable and permanent manner, the rules which ought to be followed relative to the correspondence and commerce which the two parties desire to establish between their respective countries, States, and subjects, have judged that the said end could not be better obtained than by taking, for the basis of their agreement, the most perfect equality and reciprocity, and by carefully avoiding all those burdensome preferences which are usually sources of debate, embarrassment, and discontent; by leaving also each party at liberty to make, respecting commerce and navigation, those interior regulations which it shall find most convenient to itself; and by founding the advantage of commerce solely upon reciprocal utility, and the just rules of free intercourse; reserving, withal, to each party the liberty of admitting, at its pleasure, other nations to a participation of the same advantage."

In the second article of the same treaty it was also stipulated that neither the United States nor France should thenceforth grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which should not immediately become common to the other nations, freely, if the concession was free, or for the same compensation if additional.

In answer to Mr. De Forest's note of the 12th instant, Mr. Adams has the honor of assuring him that the President has received with much satisfaction the information contained in it, and will derive great pleasure from every event which shall contribute to the stability and honor of the Government of Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Adams requests Mr. De Forest to accept the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

D. C. DE FOREST, Georgetown.

No. 8.

Mr. Adams to Mr. De Forest.

WASHINGTON, January 1, 1819.

Mr. Adams presents his compliments to Mr. De Forest, and, in reference to the case of the schooner brought into Scituate, mentioned in Mr. De Forest's communication of the 9th instant, as well as to several others which have occurred of a similar character, requests him to have the goodness to impress upon the Government of Buenos Ayres the necessity of taking measures to repress the excesses and irregularities committed by many armed vessels sailing under their flag and bearing their commissions. The Government of the United States having reason to believe that many of these vessels have been fitted out, armed, equipped, and manned in the ports of the United States, and in direct violation of their laws.

Of the persons composing the prize crew of the vessel at Scituate, and now in confinement upon charges of murder and piracy, it is understood that three are British subjects, and one a citizen of the United States. It is known that commissions for private armed vessels to be fitted out, armed, and manned in this country, have been sent from Buenos Ayres to the United States, with the names of the vessels, commanders, and officers in blank, to be filled up here, and have been offered to the avidity of speculators, stimulated more by the thirst for plunder than by any regard for the South American cause.

Of such vessels it is obvious that neither the captains, officers, nor crews can have any permanent connexion with Buenos Ayres; and, from the characters of those who alone could be induced to engage in such enterprises, there is too much reason to expect acts of atrocity, such as those alleged against the persons implicated in the case of the vessel at Scituate.

The President wishes to believe that this practice has been without the privity of the Government of Buenos Ayres, and he wishes their attention may be drawn to the sentiment, that it is incompatible both with the rights and the obligations of the United States; with their rights, as an offensive exercise of sovereign authority by foreigners within their jurisdiction, and without their consent; with their obligations, as involving a violation of the neutrality which they have invariably avowed, and which it is their determination to maintain. The President expects, from the friendly disposition manifested by the Supreme Director towards the United States, that no instance of this cause of complaint will hereafter be given.

Mr. Adams requests Mr. De Forest to accept the renewed assurances of his distinguished consideration.

DAVID C. DE FOREST, Esq.

No. 9.

GEORGETOWN, January 8, 1819.

SIR: It is not my intention to give any unnecessary trouble to the Department of State; but having had the honor of receiving two notes from Mr. Secretary Adams on the 4th instant, dated December 31 and January 1, some explanation appears to be necessary.

In the first place, I do not suppose "that any privileges which may be attached to the consular character can avail in the judicial tribunals of this country to influence in any manner the administration of justice." But I suppose that a Consul duly accredited is, ex officio, the legal representative of his fellow-citizens not otherwise represented by an express power; and that the tribunals of justice do and will admit the legality of such representation. Mr. Adams has misunderstood me in another observation, which was, in substance, that there was a general opinion prevailing at Buenos Ayres that the Power first recognising our independence would expect some extraordinary privilege or advantage therefor; and that in my opinion, the Government of Buenos Ayres would readily grant it if demanded. I know nothing, however, of any resolution having been passed on this subject by the Congress at Tucuman.

It appears, from the relation of a fact in Mr. Adams' note of the 31st ultimo, that the Government of Buenos Ayres had intimated a desire (in the course of a negotiation with an agent of the United States) to reserve the right of granting more extraordinary privileges to Spain on the settlement of a general peace, which must appear to every one contrary to their inclination as well as interest; and it can be accounted for only by supposing that the proposition of the United States' agent was merely of a temporary nature, and did not extend to an acknowledgment by the United States of the independence of South America; which act, I am confident, would have rendered any such reservation altogether unnecessary in the opinion of the Government of Buenos Ayres, who must have seen that they were treating with an unauthorized person, and must have thought it good policy at this time to suggest such an idea. Indeed, were the Government of Buenos Ayres to pursue that course, they would plead the example of a neighboring Power acknowledged to be independent by the United States, and its chief both illustrious and legitimate. It is well known that the Government of Brazil taxes the commerce of the United States about sixty per cent. higher than that of Great Britain. It may be that Great Britain is entitled to this preference on account of important services rendered by her to the King of Portugal; and permit me to ask you, sir, what services could be rendered to any nation already in existence so great, as would be the acknowledgment by Great Britain, or by the United States, of the independence of South America? Such recognition merely, by either of these Powers, would probably have the immediate effect of putting an end to the cruel and destructive war now raging between Spain and South America, and crown with never-fading laurels the nation thus first using its influence in favor of an oppressed but high-minded people.

The account given by Mr. Adams in his note of the 1st instant, respecting the irregular conduct of vessels sailing under the Buenos Ayres flag, has caused me much mortification, and has already been transmitted to my Government by the Plattsburg; as also a copy of Mr. Adams' frank and friendly communication of the 31st ultimo. The Supreme Director will certainly be desirous to adopt the most prompt and efficacious measures within his power to remedy the evils complained of. But pray, sir, what can he do more than has already been done? The Government of Buenos Ayres have established the most just rules and regulations for the government of their vessels of war, as well as of commerce, and have sent me to this country invested with the title and powers of their Consul General, as well to guard against any breach of those rules and regulations by their citizens and vessels frequenting these seas and the ports of these United States, as to protect them in their rights; but, sir, without a recognition of my powers on the part of this Government, I can have no right whatever to question any individual on the subject of his conduct; nor can any responsibility justly attach to me nor to my Government, during such a state of things, for the irregularities committed.

A considerable number of our seamen are foreigners by birth, who have voluntarily entered our service; therefore it is not a matter of surprise that, of the mutineers of the prize crew of the vessel at Scituate, three should have been born Englishmen, and one a North American. It is, however, an absolute fact, to which I am personally knowing, that the captors of that prize (the Buenos Ayres and Tucuman privateers) were legally fitted out at Buenos Ayres early in the last year, from which port they sailed on a cruise off Cadiz; and it will afford the Government of South America much satisfaction to learn that the United States will prosecute those mutineers, and punish such as are found guilty of crimes, according to the laws.

Before I close this note I beg leave to make a few observations, in answer to one of the reasons for not accrediting me, given by Mr. Adams, by direction of the President of the United States, in a conversation which I have had the honor of holding with him, viz: "That the act of accrediting me as Consul General would be tantamount to the formal acknowledgment of the independence of the Government which sent me." I do not profess to be skilled in the laws of nations, nor of diplomacy; nor would I doubt the correctness of any opinion expressed by the President, for whose person and character I have ever entertained the most profound respect; yet I must say, that I cannot understand the difference between the sending of a consular agent duly authorized to Buenos Ayres, where one was accredited from this country, four or five years ago, and has continued ever since in the exercise of the duties of his office, and the reception of a similar agent here. I also beg leave to mention that I was in this country soon after the arrival of the present Minister of Spain, the Chevalier De Onis; and to have heard it observed that, being a political agent, he was not accredited, because the sovereignty of Spain was in dispute; but that the Consuls who acknowledged the same Government (one of the claimants to the sovereignty, and the one not actually in possession of it) were allowed to exercise their functions. If this was the case at that time, the Government of the United States must then have had a different opinion on this subject from what it now has. Mr. Adams will please to bear in mind that I have only solicited to be accredited as a Consular Agent, having never agitated the question of an acknowledgment of our independence as a nation, which most certainly is anxiously desired by the Government and people of South America, but which, being a political question, I have never asked.

Mr. Adams will also be pleased to accept the renewed assurances of my most distinguished consideration and respect.

DAVID C. DE FOREST.

No. 10.

The Supreme Director of the United Provinces of La Plata, to His Excellency the President of the United States of North America.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The Supreme Government of these provinces have long exerted their zealous efforts to establish the closest and most amicable relations with the United States of America, to which the most obvious interests seem mutually to invite them. This desirable object has hitherto been frustrated by the events of the times; but the moment appears at length to have arrived, which presents to the people of these provinces the flattering prospect of seeing their ardent wishes accomplished. In consideration of these circumstances, and in conformity with the twenty-third of the articles agreed upon with citizen William G. D. Worthington, the agent of your Government in these provinces, I have nominated citizen David C. De Forest, their Consul General to the United States, with the powers specified in his commission and instructions respectively. I therefore request your excellency to grant him the attention and consideration which, in the like case, will be afforded to the public agents of your nation, thereby laying the foundation of those relations which will in future render the name of your excellency memorable in these regions.

I avail myself of this renewed occasion of reiterating to your excellency assurances of the sentiments of respect and consideration with which I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient and most humble servant.

JN. MN. DE PUEYRREDON.

PRUSSIA, HAMBURG, AND BREMEN.

[Communicated to Congress February 8, 1819.]
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress, for their consideration, applications which have been received from the Minister resident of Prussia, and from the Senates of the free and Hanseatic cities of Hamburg and Bremen; the object of which is, that the advantages secured by the act of Congress of the 20th of April last, to the vessels and merchandise of the Netherlands, should be extended to those of Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen. It will appear from the documents that the vessels of the United States, and the merchandise laden in them, are, in the ports of those Governments, respectively, entitled to the same advantages in respect to imposts and duties as those of the native subjects of the countries themselves. The principle of reciprocity appears to entitle them to the return of the same favor on the part of the United States, and I recommend it to Congress that provision to that effect may be made.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 6, 1819.

PRUSSIA.

WASHINGTON, November 14, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister resident of His Majesty the King of Prussia, had the honor, on the 21st of November last, to address to the Secretary of State a note, in conformity with the orders of his Government, proposing to the Government of the United States, in relation to the commerce between the two nations, the adoption of the principle of perfect reciprocity as established by the act of 3d March, 1815.

This subject was recommended to the Congress by the President of the United States, in his Message of 19th March last, conjointly with similar propositions made by the Government of the Netherlands, and by the Hanse towns of Hamburg and Bremen. But the act of Congress of 20th April, regulating this object, applied only to the commerce of the Netherlands. By the President's proclamation of 25th July last, the same principle was adopted in regard to Bremen, and, by a subsequent proclamation of the 1st of August as to Hamburg, with this difference: that these proclamations only speak of the produce and manufactures of those two towns; whereas the act of 20th April declares that not only the produce and manufactures of the kingdom of the Netherlands, imported into the United States in Dutch vessels, but such produce and manufactures generally, as can only be, or most usually are, shipped from a port or place in the kingdom of the Netherlands, should be subjected to no higher import duties than if imported in vessels of the United States.

Now, the cities of Hamburg and Bremen, more favorably situated for commerce with the United States than the ports of Prussia on the Baltic, are the chief ports of export of the Prussian trade; consequently, the adoption of the principle of perfect commercial reciprocity, between the States of Prussia and the United States, would have but a very partial effect if the produce and manufactures of Prussia, exported in Bremen and Hamburg vessels, did not enjoy similar advantages on importation into the United States in Prussian bottoms.

The object of the present note having been specially recommended to the undersigned in a memoir of the Chancellor of State of His Majesty the King of Prussia, an extract of which was annexed to the note of the 21st of November above referred to, and subsequently by His Majesty's Minister of Foreign Affairs, he had the honor to address the Secretary of State anew, and to repeat the request stated in his aforesaid note. He has to add, that the Government of Prussia, the more confidently expects that the Government of the United States will adopt suitable measures to terminate this affair, as, in the ports of Prussia, there exists no discrimination on this point between Prussian vessels and those of the United States and their cargoes.

The undersigned eagerly avails himself of this occasion to offer to the Secretary of State the renewed assurances of his highest consideration.

WASHINGTON, November 21, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister resident of His Majesty the King of Prussia, conceives that he cannot better fulfil the orders of his Government, relative to the re-establishment and extension of the commerce of the States of Prussia with the United States, than by transmitting to the Secretary of State the copy of a memoir, in the form of an instruction, addressed to him at his departure from Berlin by His Majesty's Chancellor of State, the Prince of Hardenberg.

He begs leave to recommend it to the suitable attention of the Secretary of State until he can favor him with the honor of a conference on the subject of its contents; and he avails himself of this occasion to tender to him the assurances of his highest consideration.

F. GREUHM.

BERLIN, June 30, 1817.

With a view to extend the commercial relation of Prussia and the United States of America by promoting the exchange of their produce and manufactures, and thereby rendering the trade of the two nations reciprocally as beneficial as possible, Mr. Greuhm shall propose to the Government of the United States—

1st. That Prussian vessels shall be subjected in the ports of the United States to no other imposts, charges, and duties than are paid by American vessels.

2d. That articles of Prussian manufacture imported into the United States in Prussian vessels shall pay no higher duties than those imported in American vessels.

Mr. Greuhm is therefore authorized to declare to the Government of the United States that the Government of Prussia is willing to establish a perfect reciprocity in this respect; that is to say, that vessels of the United States shall pay in the ports of the Prussian States no other imposts, charges, and duties than those paid by Prussian vessels, as well for ships as for cargoes, provided Prussian vessels and cargoes shall enjoy the same favors in the ports of the Republic.

This principle of perfect reciprocity having already been formally and generally established by the act of 3d March, 1815, copy of which is annexed, no other formality will consequently be necessary than an authentic declaration on the part of Prussia to obtain the adoption of it in her favor by the United States.

The commerce between the United States and Prussia will by this measure be rendered direct and immediate and be exempt in future from the necessity of resorting to the intervention of any foreign nation for that purpose; and thus the Americans, instead of importing Prussian goods through the medium of the Hamburgers and others, will send their own ships and cargoes directly to Stettin, Dantzic, &c., for those goods. It will further tend to promote their national navigation, by opening a new and beneficial channel of trade. Coming themselves to procure such Prussian goods as they may want, and receiving them from the first hand, they will obtain them of better quality and at more moderate prices.

HARDENBERG.

HAMBURGH.

The Burgomasters and Senate of Hamburg to the President of the United States.

PRESIDENT: The blessings of peace having been restored to the world, and Hamburg having resumed her pristine liberty and independence, it was amongst our foremost and most ardent wishes not only to renew our friendly intercourse with the Government of the United States, but, if possible, to make it more intimate and extensive. It is with a view of expressing these sentiments that we take the liberty of addressing your excellency, in full confidence that the friendship which the Government of the United States has formerly shown to us and our citizens is not changed by the severe misfortunes of which our city has been the victim of late years. We presume to rely the more on those sentiments, as we require the support of friendly Powers, and in particular of mercantile States, in order to raise us again to our former useful importance. It will be an object of our greatest care to improve our friendly relations with the Government of the United States, and nothing would give us more satisfaction than the mercantile intercourse which connects our town with the United States assuming the greatest importance, and resting upon the most solid foundation. To promote this desirable object, we have, immediately after the reorganization of the constitutional Government of this Republic, caused the custom-house laws to be reported, and the duties to be determined as moderate as possible. These custom-house laws, which establish for the inhabitants of the United States, in respect of their ships, goods, and importations, a perfect equality with our own citizens, and the importations under our own flag, have passed and have already been promulgated last year. We are led, however, to dwell upon them at present, and to refer to these laws, the board of trade of this place having called our attention to an act of Congress dated the 3d of March, entitled "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States;" desiring we might give to your excellency the assurance required by the said act of Congress of the 3d of March. To this effect we certify to your excellency by these presents:

That, by virtue of the existing laws of Hamburg, and particularly the custom-house laws, the American ships, their loading and importations, are not subject in our city and its ports to any higher duties on the tonnage and on the goods than our own Hamburg ships, their loading and importations; and beg leave to request that your excellency may please to order that the trade and navigation of this city, as much as respects German produce and manufactures, may be relieved from the additional burdens which have till now been exacted, and that they may be admitted to the same privileges which have been bestowed on the trade and navigation of other nations in amity with the United States.

We have the honor to sign, with the sentiments of high consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servants, the Burgomasters and Senate of the free Hanseatic city of Hamburg,

WILHELM AMSINCK,
Burgomaster, President.
T. H. HEISED, Secretary.

Given the 13th of November, 1815.

Mr. Buck to the Secretary of State.

HAMBURGH CONSULATE GENERAL,
Philadelphia, August 1, 1818.

SIR: Under date of the 25th May last, I had the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th of the same month, conveying to me the exequator as Consul General for the Republic of Hamburg. At the same time, I took the liberty to renew my application to be informed from your department of the determination of his excellency the President of the United States relative to the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, as far as it may interest the commerce with Hamburg; but till now I still remain without any communication on that subject.

The certificate which accompanied the letter of March 3, 1817, from the Senate of Hamburg, (testifying that, in the city and port of Hamburg, American ships, their loading and importations, are perfectly treated on the same footing as, and in every respect equalized with, our own Hamburg ships, their loading and importations, in regard to the custom-house and all other duties and tonnage,) I had the honor to transmit to the Department of State, and afterwards delivered the duplicate in person. This, I understood at the time, was fully satisfactory, and wanted only the determination of his excellency the President of the United States to entitle the city of Hamburg to the privileges prescribed in the act of Congress under date of March 3, 1815.

I observe now a proclamation, under date of the 24th of July last, on the same subject, relative to the Hanseatic city of Bremen, which induces me to a renewal of my application to give the same relief to the trade and navigation of Hamburg.

In expectation of a speedy, favorable reply, I have the honor to remain, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient servant.

C. N. BUCK,

Consul General from Hamburg.

HON. JOHN Q. ADAMS.

Mr. Buck to the Secretary of State.

HAMBURGH CONSUL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Philadelphia, Jan. 23, 1819.

SIR: Since I last had the honor of conferring with you on the subject of the commercial relations between the free and Hanseatic city of Hamburg and the United States of America, further advices have been received by me; in consequence of which, I take the liberty of addressing this letter to you.

I am instructed, sir, by the Senate of Hamburg to express to you that they have received the communication of the President's proclamation of the 1st August, A. D. 1818, by which all discriminating duties on the tonnage and merchandise of the respective States are abolished; that the Senate of Hamburg also derive the highest satisfaction from the manifestation of liberal and amicable dispositions on the part of the United States to their republic, and that the continuation of those friendly dispositions will always be duly appreciated by them.

But I am also instructed by the Senate of Hamburg to represent to you, sir, that the concluding part of the proclamation of the President, in which it is stated that the aforesaid discriminating or countervailing duties on merchandise imported "are repealed, so far as the same respect the produce or manufacture of the said free and Hanseatic city of Hamburg," has given to the Senate of Hamburg sincere cause of objection and regret, as they cannot but perceive in the said modification a most injurious operation in relation to their carrying trade and peculiar interests, and which would, in its necessary tendency, almost destroy totally the basis on which the Senate of Hamburg determined on the abolition of all discriminating or countervailing duties, and would almost entirely exclude their shipping from the ports of the United States.

This objection, sir, is considered by the Senate of Hamburg as being further strengthened, by perceiving that the more favorable stipulation has been entered into by the United States, in relation to the same subject, with the Government of the Netherlands; the injurious consequences of which the Senate of Hamburg are most sensibly aware of.

In addition, sir, I take the liberty of communicating to you that I am instructed by the Senate of Hamburg to have a conference with you on the above subject, and to receive from the Government of the United States a statement of their views and decisions in relation to the same.

I consequently take the liberty to request of you that the subject of the above communication will be laid before the President of the United States, with a hope that the Congress of the United States will pass an act that will meet the views of the Senate of Hamburg, to extend to them the privilege that such goods, produce, and manufactures, as most usually are first shipped from Hamburg, may be considered as their native productions, when imported in Hamburg vessels, in the ports of the United States.

With great consideration, I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my particular respect, and, in the expectation of your answer, I remain, with great regard, sir, your most obedient servant,

C. N. BUCK,

BREMEN.

Mr. Wichelhausen to the Secretary of State.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 26, 1819.

SIR: I had the honor of addressing you on the 2d and 23d of December, 1818, to which, however, I have not been favored with an answer.

I understand the collector of this port received yesterday a letter from the Treasury Department, stating circulars would be issued in a few days to give directions that Swedish vessels should be put on the same footing with American vessels, and that goods in Swedish vessels should pay no more duty than goods in American vessels. Permit me to hope that this opportunity will be seized by the Treasury Department to include the necessary instructions respecting the duty upon goods in Bremen vessels. The collector of this port appears to be decidedly of opinion that the Treasury Department, by the act of Congress of the 3d March, 1815, is fully authorized to give the desired construction to that law, and direct the collectors accordingly.

The request of the Bremen Government being founded upon equity and justice, the Senate of Bremen was confident in the hope that it would be granted by the American Government without delay.

I did not think it necessary to proceed again to Washington for the purpose of communicating with you in person on a subject which I understand required no further discussion. However, if it is not acceptable I should address you in writing. I beg to be instructed, and I shall do myself the honor to wait upon you at Washington.

With the highest consideration, I remain, sir, your very humble servant,

H. D. WICHELHAUSEN.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

The Burgomasters and Senators of the Free Hanse Town of Bremen to the President of the United States:

SIR: We have been informed by Mr. Wichelhausen, who had the honor to present to your excellency our letter of the 20th January, 1818, of the proclamation you were pleased to issue on the 24th July last, for the purpose of giving effect to the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, in favor of Bremen vessels entering American ports.

By this formal equalization of duties, and the simultaneous reimbursement of such as have been paid since the 12th of May, 1815, so far as they exceed the equalization decreed by law, the American Government has given a new and signal proof of that spirit of justice which characterizes its proceedings. We offer to your excellency our sincere acknowledgments for this evidence of your good will towards us, and for your favorable reception of our fellow-citizen, Mr. Wichelhausen.

We presume, however, that your excellency will not hesitate to direct that the provisions of the act of the 3d March, 1815, be made applicable to such products and manufactures as, by the general course of trade carried on here, are exported from our port. The very terms of that act, referring the products or manufactures of the nation to which the foreign vessels belong, seem most clearly to designate articles of the growth or industry of Germany, as composed of a body of States, of which Bremen forms an integral part, and to stipulate the equalization of duties in favor of such goods, when exported in Bremen vessels. The treaty concluded with the Government of the Netherlands, extending the equalization of duties "to such produce or manufactures as can only be, or most usually are, first shipped from a port or place in the Kingdom," &c., as well as the tenor of the American act of navigation of 1st May, 1817, seem to remove all doubt as to a correspondent application of the act of Congress to goods shipped from our port.

It is only in this view that the object of the act can be attained of removing all the obstacles which have hitherto obstructed the commerce of the Americans with foreign nations. It appearing to be highly interesting to both nations to favor, as much as possible, the trade carried on between the American ports and that of Bremen, we have submitted to your excellency the evidences of our sincere desire to grant the most special favors to the American commerce, and we therefore flatter ourselves that we shall receive the most unqualified proof of the establishment of that reciprocity which forms the avowed principle of the wise policy of the American Government—a policy eminently calculated to render their country prosperous and happy.

With these sentiments, inspired by a full and entire confidence, we recommended anew to your excellency the interest of our city; and we renew to you the assurances of the very high consideration with which we have the honor to be, sir,

Your Excellency's most devoted Burgomasters and Senators of the free Hanse Town of Bremen.

SPAIN.

INDEMNIFICATION—LIMITS—FLORIDA.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 22, 1819.]

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, concluded and signed this day, for the decision of the Senate as to its ratification. Copies of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister from Spain, connected with this subject, since the renewal of the negotiation, are likewise enclosed.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 22, 1819.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1815.

SIR: The diplomatic relations between the King, my master, and the United States, being happily restored, and both Governments being disposed mutually to strengthen the ties of the most pure and perfect friendship, it is my duty to inform the President of whatever may contribute to so desirable an object, and remove the obstacles which may prevent it. On the important points on which this note must turn, I have written to you under other circumstances less favorable than the present. I will now confine myself to a plain and simple explanation of them.

The first of these points is, that the direct and official relations between Spain and the United States having been broken off since the year 1808, the affairs of both nations, as well as their respective frontiers, should now be placed in the same state and situation in which they were at that period; and that, in conformity to this principle, the part of West Florida which the United States took possession of during the glorious insurrection of Spain, and have retained until this day, should be restored to His Catholic Majesty. This just and conciliatory measure, at the same time that it will convince the King, my master, of the purity and sincerity of the sentiments of the American Government, and of their disposition to arrange and terminate amicably the several points of negotiation, will not in the least impair the right which it may believe it has to the whole or a part of the territory occupied, since it will remain subject, exactly as it was before its occupation, to a frank and friendly discussion between the two Governments.

The second point is as simple and obvious as the first, and I will treat of it with that confidence with which I ought to be inspired by the indisputable justice of my importunity, the justification of the American Government, and the importance of the affair.

It is known to you, and is universally public and notorious, that a factious band of insurgents and incendiaries continue with impunity, in the province of Louisiana, and especially in New Orleans and Natchitoches, the uninterrupted system of raising and arming troops to light the flame of revolution in the kingdom of New Spain, and to rob the pacific inhabitants of the dominions of the King, my master. The invasion of the internal provinces, the horrible assassinations committed in San Antonio de Bexar, and the names of the perfidious perpetrators of such unheard-of crimes, have acquired the publicity which great crimes always will acquire. All Louisiana has witnessed these armaments; the public enlistments, (los enganches publicos;) the transportation of arms; the junction of the insurgents, and their hostile and warlike march from the territory of this Republic against the possessions of a friendly and neighboring Power. Neither threats, nor the laws, nor the indignation of well-disposed citizens, nor even the proclamation of the President of the 1st of September last, intended to restrain these highway robbers, have been sufficient to stop their nefarious plans. On the contrary, they prosecute them with the greatest ardor and rancor, more and more exasperated at seeing the glorious triumphs of the Spanish nation, the adhesion of his subjects to an adored monarch, and the approaching re-establishment of the relations between our respective nations. It is known to me that they are now enlisting in New Orleans men for other expeditions, both by land and water, to invade again the dominions of His Catholic Majesty, under the direction of ringleaders Jose Alvarez de Toledo and Jose Manuel de Herrera, who has just arrived in that city with the appointment (as he says) of Minister to the United States from the self-styled Mexican Congress, who has delivered to Toledo fifteen hundred commissions in black from that body of insurgents, that he may confer them on a like number of officers which he is recruiting in the territory of this Union. I omit mentioning to you other innumerable acts of this kind, which prove the publicity of these armaments, and the impunity with which they continue. I will confine myself to stating to you that the most common practice of nations, and the authority of the best writers on public law, would give a right to the King, my master, to require of this Government to deliver up these traitors as incendiaries, enemies of all social order, and disturbers of the peace of his subjects; but as the object of my Sovereign is not to avenge himself of these banditti, but to shield his subjects against their barbarity, I confine myself to asking of you to obtain of the President orders for the prosecution of the principal persons concerned in this sedition, that is to say: Jose Alvarez de Toledo, Anaya, Ortez, the self-styled minister Manuel de Herrera, Doctors Robinson and Humbert, Majors Piere and Preire, and their followers; that they may be punished with all the rigor which the laws prescribe in cases of this kind; that the troops which they have raised may be disarmed and dispersed, and that the necessary measures be taken to prevent, in future, these evil spirits from having an opportunity of pursuing their designs, and attempting to compromise the good intelligence which subsists between our respective Governments. The President cannot but have seen with sensibility as well the total want of effect of his proclamation of the lenient measures which he had adopted against these criminals, who boast of recognising no law, subordination, or moral principle, as the protection and support which they have received, and do receive, from the authorities at New Orleans, contrary to his express orders. His Excellency, as he is encharged by this Republic with watching over its security and the observance of its treaties and laws, cannot but consider himself authorized to restrain the projects and hostile measures of a set of adventurers who make open war against a friendly Power from the territory of this Confederation, compromising its tranquillity and high character, by availing himself of the means which the Constitution, the laws, and his prudence offer to him for obliging these persons to abandon their designs, and to manifest to His Catholic Majesty the just indignation with which the United States view the hostile plans and the sedition of that band of incendiaries. I am certain that it cannot be concealed from the distinguished talents of the President and yourself, that the point of which I treat is not one under the civil (or municipal) law—in which case my Sovereign must have recourse to the ordinary tribunals—but that it is a manifest and flagrant violation of the most sacred laws which bind together nations mutually, perpetrated by the citizens or residents of the Union, of which the King, my master, gives information, with positive and notorious proofs to the Government under whose jurisdiction it has been executed, that they may give him competent satisfaction, with a knowledge of the act, by causing the delinquents to be punished as guilty of high treason against both Governments.

The third and last point is reduced to this: that the President will be pleased to give the necessary orders to the collectors of the customs not to admit into the ports of the United States vessels under the insurrectionary flag of Carthagena, of the Mexican Congress, of Buenos Ayres, or of the other places which have revolted against the authority of the King, my master, nor those coming from them; that they should not permit them to land, or to sell in this country, the shameful proceeds of their piracy or atrocities, and much less to equip themselves in these ports, as they do, for the purpose of going to sea, to destroy and to plunder the vessels which they may meet with under the Spanish flag. This tolerance, subversive of the most solemn stipulations in the treaties between Spain and the United States, and diametrically opposed to the general principles of public security and good faith, and to the laws of nations, produces the most melancholy effects on the interest and the prosperity of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty. Certain it is that neither Carthagena, nor any other place in the Spanish dominions in this hemisphere, which has revolted, can be in communication with any Power friendly to Spain, since neither on its part, nor on that of any other Government, has their independence been acknowledged; and it is, consequently, an offence against the dignity of the Spanish monarchy, and against the sovereignty of the King, my master, to admit vessels from such places, manned and commanded by insurgents, and armed in the dominions of this Confederation; particularly as they are all pirates, who do not respect any flag, are justly considered the disgrace of the seas, and are execrated by all nations.

The three preceding points are of such established equity and justice, that it would be offensive to the delicacy of this Government to suppose that it could delay, under any pretext, to determine on them in the manner I have proposed, and which I have an express order to request (solicitar) in the name of the King, my master. The prompt interposition of the President, that His Majesty may be gratified, would be a new testimony of his friendly disposition towards Spain; an evident proof that he is determined to put an end to the incalculable extortions and injuries which Spain has suffered for the space of seven years, from the gang of adventurers who have assailed her from the bosom of this Republic; a means of fixing the frank and sincere system of good neighborhood which so much interests both States; and, finally, a sure preliminary to the removal of all the difficulties which may present themselves in the negotiations which ought to terminate all the pending discussions between the two Governments, and to fix forever between them a perpetual and solid friendship.

If, as I flatter myself, the President gives all the attention which is due to affairs of such transcendent importance, and yields to my solicitations, I can assure his Excellency, and yourself, that there will be nothing which the King, my master, will not be disposed to do to satisfy this Republic, which may be compatible with his dignity and with the interests of his subjects.

I renew to you the assurances of my particular respect, and of my constant desire to please you, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Hon. JAS. MONROE, &c.

Translation which accompanied a note of the 2d January, 1816, from the Chevalier de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: Since the last note I had the honor to address you, under date of the 30th December, I have received positive information that the expedition which the traitor Toledo was preparing in New Orleans against the dominions of the King, my master, has been suspended until the arrival at that city of two bodies of troops, (one thousand men from Kentucky, and three hundred from Tennessee,) commanded by two American citizens, that were to be united in twenty-four days to the army of the insurgents. I abstain, sir, from offering to you any observations on a subject of such high importance, and so well established. I am well persuaded that his Excellency the President will easily perceive that if the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Georgia continue, as they do, allowing their citizens to commit hostilities against a friendly Power, notwithstanding the orders he has issued for dispersing and disarming the gang of desperadoes headed by Toledo, Humbert, Anaya, Bernardo Gutierrez, Istri, Doctor Robinson, Majors Piere and Preire, and their followers, the King, my master, will have reason to suspect that, if those meetings are not authorized by the Government, they are at least tolerated. All the assurances I may give to my Sovereign of the friendly dispositions of his Excellency the President will not suffice, when compared with the evident proofs I had the honor to communicate to you in this and my former note; particularly when His Majesty is well convinced of the resources and authority of the Federal Government, and the promptitude with which their orders are strictly observed in the whole Union. I do not entertain any apprehension of the result of the expedition of these incendiaries. The European wars being terminated, His Majesty will be able to direct all his attention, and his powerful armies, to stifle at once the growth of that insurrection; but the philanthropic heart of my Sovereign, the humanity by which he is distinguished, and which constitutes the character of the Spanish nation, induce him to wish to re-establish order among the seduced rather by mildness than by the force of arms, which cannot be effected without the effusion of the blood of his beloved subjects. This object cannot fail to be obtained as soon as the Mexican insurgents and those of the internal provinces cease to be furnished, by the citizens of this Republic, with arms, ammunition, and troops.

I shall never have the vain presumption to offer you, or the wise Magistrate that is at the head of this Administration, any observations on the consequences that might result against the interests of this Republic by the independence of Spanish America. My wishes are only directed to equal you in moderation, and to re-establish, on the most firm and permanent basis, the relations between our Governments. This sincere desire will, I hope, serve as an apology for me, while I take the liberty to present an hypothesis in this note.

I grant, for a moment, that all the Mexican empire erects itself into an independent State; that it adopts the wise Constitution of this Confederation; establishes a complete system of legislation; and, finally, that it enjoys all the blessings of liberty in the same full extent as this Republic. It is beyond question that the climate of Mexico is more temperate than that of the United States; the soil richer and more productive; the productions and fruits more abundant, rich, and of a superior quality; and that provisions, labor, wood, houses, clothing, &c., are, in consequence of the mildness and regularity of the climate, much cheaper than in this country. If this event should take place, do you not think, sir, as I do, that so many alluring prospects, and so many evident advantages, will deprive this Republic of the successive emigrations from Europe, and, what is more, of a very considerable part of the most useful and industrious inhabitants of this Confederation, who would carry with them to Mexico their flour and saw-mills, machines, manufactures, their enterprising genius—in a word, their general instruction, and all the means that actually promote and vivify the commerce of these States? I flatter myself that this event will not happen; but I am fully convinced that the consequences of this hypothesis can be demonstrated almost with a mathematical certainty; and that if the citizens of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Georgia, should reflect deeply on this subject, far from giving any aid to those vagabonds, greedy of the acquisition of gold, and regardless of the happiness of their country, they would unite themselves with the authorities of the King, my master, to punish that gang of perfidious traitors that hide themselves in these States with the criminal design of devastating their country. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to overlook this digression, to which I have been carried by my warm desire of strengthening the most perfect friendship between the two nations, and to inform his Excellency the President that the orders I claim in His Catholic Majesty's name, directed to the trial and punishment of the ringleaders of those armies, and to the prohibition of exporting arms of any kind from this country to the provinces, against my Sovereign's authority, are of the greatest importance, and are supported by the existing treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, between Spain and the United States, especially the sixteenth article.

I expect, sir, your answer to these important points, and I have the honor to be, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 19, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letters of the 30th of December and 2d of January last, and to submit them to the President.

You demand that your Sovereign shall be put in possession of West Florida; that certain persons, whom you have mentioned, shall be arrested and tried on the charge of promoting insurrection in the Spanish provinces, and exciting citizens of the United States to join in it; and, thirdly, that the flags of Carthagena, the Mexican Congress, Buenos Ayres, and other revolting provinces, shall be excluded from the ports of the United States.

On the re-establishment of the diplomatic relations between the United States and Spain, it was hoped that your Government would not have confined its attention to the objects in which Spain is alone interested, but have extended it to the injuries of which the United States have so long and so justly complained, with a view to such reparation as it might now be able to make. The subjects are in their nature intimately connected. In some important circumstances, indeed, it is impossible to separate them, since the exposition of the wrongs of the United States affords the proper answer, in those instances, to the complaints of Spain. It is my duty to bring these wrongs into view, that they may be duly considered and provided for, in case your Government has, as I am bound to presume, invested you with adequate powers for the purpose.

At a period anterior to either of the circumstances mentioned in your letters, the United States had suffered great injury by the unlawful seizure and condemnation of their vessels in the ports of Spain. A treaty providing an indemnity for those spoliations was agreed to and signed by a Minister duly authorized by each Government; but its ratification, though negotiated and concluded in the presence of the Spanish Government, was afterwards declined by it. At an anterior period, too, the deposite at New Orleans, stipulated by the treaty of 1795, was suppressed. As the United States had done no injury to Spain, these acts, so hostile in their nature, and injurious in their effect, excited much surprise: It had been the uniform object of this Government to make such arrangements with Spain respecting the free navigation of the Mississippi and the boundaries, as, securing to our citizens the full enjoyment of their rights, would place the peace and friendship of the two countries on a solid and durable basis. With this view, it was sought to obtain of Spain, at a fair equivalent, the territory eastward of the Mississippi. Overtures to this effect were made to the Spanish Government, and rejected. Being renewed, the Minister of the United States was informed that Spain had ceded Louisiana to France, to whom he was referred for the acquisition of such territory in that quarter as he might be instructed to make. On the last very important event, the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, a special mission was instituted to France and Spain, the object of which was to avert, by amicable negotiation and arrangement, the calamities of war. Affairs had, more especially by this act of violence and hostility, reached a crisis which precluded the idea of temporary palliatives. A comprehensive and permanent arrangement had become indispensable, of which, it was presumed, the Governments of France and Spain would be equally sensible. The cession of Louisiana by France to the United States was the immediate consequence of this mission, with such a description of its boundaries by the treaty as, it was presumed, would leave no cause of controversy with Spain.

The mission had thus succeeded in a very important object; but there were others of a similar character which remained to be adjusted. The differences with Spain still existed, and to them was added a circumstance of much interest, proceeding from the acquisition of Louisiana—the unsettled boundaries of the province, which were now to be established with Spain. Under the influence of the same policy, the special mission was ordered soon afterwards to Madrid, to invite a negotiation for the arrangement of all these important concerns. Spain still held territory to the eastward of Perdido, which, by her cession of Louisiana, and its transfer to the United States, was separated from her other dominions, and lay, except on the side of the ocean, exclusively within our limits. The importance of this territory to Spain, in consequence of these events, in any view which might be taken of it, seemed to be much diminished, if not entirely lost; while, in certain views of which it was susceptible, it might prove highly injurious. There was danger that the continuance of a Spanish colony there might produce jealousy and variance between the two nations. On the other hand, the United States had acquired territory westward of the Mississippi, adjoining the provinces of Spain, which it was supposed she might be desirous of obtaining. By mutual cessions of territory in quarters most convenient to each other, and by forming an interval between their possessions to remain vacant, the danger of collision might be avoided, and their good understanding more effectually preserved. By rendering justice likewise to the claims of the United States, their citizens would be contented, and their Government be better enabled to control their conduct beyond their limits. Here, then, seemed to be a fair ground for amicable compromise between the parties. An opportunity was presented for terminating every difference, and securing their future harmony without loss or sacrifice by either. On the result of this mission I need not enlarge.

I shall remark only that the friendly policy which produced it was not reciprocated by your Government; it was, perhaps, not felt; it was certainly disregarded. Every proposition of the American Ministers, having these objects in view, was rejected, and none made in return by your Government.

This conduct of your Government would have justified, if it did not invite, the most decisive measures on the part of the United States. The refusal to make reparation for preceding injuries, or to surrender any portion of the territory in the possession of Spain, to which they considered their title indisputable, or to accept fair and liberal propositions for the accommodation of these differences, or to make a proposition of any kind for the purpose, left the United States perfectly free to pursue such course as, in their judgment, a just regard to the honor, rights, and interests of the nation might dictate. In the condition of Spain there was nothing to excite apprehension of the consequences, whatever might be the course decided on. Of this, the well-known state of the Peninsula at the time, and since, and of the Spanish provinces in America, affords ample proof. The friendly policy which the United States have since pursued is the more conspicuous from the consideration that your Government has inflexibly maintained the unjust and hostile attitude which it then assumed, and has even added new injuries and insults to those of which I have already complained. I refer, in this latter remark, to the breaches of the neutrality of Spain, which her Government permitted, if it did not authorize, by British troops and British agents in Florida, and, through that province, with the Creeks and other Indian tribes, in the late war with Great Britain, to the great injury of the United States. It is under these circumstances that you have made the demands above recited, to which I will now proceed to give a more particular reply.

You require that Spain shall be put into possession of West Florida, as an act of justice, before a discussion of the right of the parties to it is entered on.

It is known to your Government that the United States claim by cession, as a fair equivalent, the province of Louisiana, as it was held by France prior to the treaty of 1763, extending from the river Perdido, on the eastern side of the Mississippi, to the Bravo or Grande, on the western. To the whole territory within those limits, the United States consider their right established by well-known facts and the fair interpretation of treaties. In a like spirit may the United States demand the surrender of all the territory above described, now in the occupancy of Spain, as a condition to the commencement of any negotiation for the adjustment of differences. When we consider how long your Government has maintained what is deemed an unjust possession; more especially when we recollect that the injuries before received are still unredressed, and that others have been since rendered, there can be, it is presumed, but one opinion as to the great moderation of this Government in acquiescing in it. But why restore this province to Spain, if it is the intention of your Government to make the title to it, in connexion with other differences, a subject of amicable negotiation and arrangement? May not such a negotiation be entered into as well while it is in the occupancy of the United States as if it were in that of Spain?

You demand, next, that Mr. Toledo, and others whom you mention, charged with promoting revolt in the Spanish provinces, and exciting citizens of the United States to join in it, shall be arrested and tried, their troops disarmed and dispersed.

You intimate that troops are levying in Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Georgia, for the invasion of the Spanish provinces, of whom one thousand are from Kentucky, and three hundred from Tennessee, to be commanded by American citizens; but you do not state at what points these men are collected, or by whom commanded; and as to the forces said to be raised in Louisiana and Georgia, your communication is still more indefinite. The information recently obtained by this Department from persons of high consideration is of a very different character. It is stated that no men are collected, nor is there evidence of an attempt or design to collect any in Kentucky, Tennessee, or Georgia, for the purpose stated; and that the force said to be assembled under Mr. Toledo is very inconsiderable, and composed principally of Spaniards and Frenchmen. If any portion of it consists of citizens of the United States, their conduct is unauthorized and illegal. This force is not within the settled parts of Louisiana, but in the wilderness, between the settlements of the United States and Spain, beyond the actual operation of our laws. I have to request that you will have the goodness to state at what points in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, and Louisiana, any force is collected, the number in each instance, and by whom commanded. If such force is collected, or collecting, within the United States, for the purpose suggested, or other illegal purpose, it will be dispersed, and the parties prosecuted according to law.

This Government is under no obligation, nor has it the power, by any law or treaty, to surrender any inhabitant of Spain or the Spanish provinces on the demand of the Government of Spain; nor is any such inhabitant punishable by the laws of the United States for acts committed beyond their jurisdiction, the case of pirates alone excepted. This is a fundamental law of our system. It is not, however, confined to us; it is believed to be the law of all civilized nations, where not particularly varied by treaties.

In reply to your third demand—the exclusion of the flag of the revolting provinces—I have to observe that, in consequence of the unsettled state of many countries, and repeated changes of the ruling authority in each, there being at the same time several competitors, and each party bearing its appropriate flag, the President thought it proper, some time past, to give orders to the collectors not to make the flag of any vessel a criterion or condition of its admission into the ports of the United States. Having taken no part in the differences and convulsions which have disturbed those countries, it is consistent with the just principles, as it is with the interests, of the United States to receive the vessels of all countries into their ports, to whatever party belonging, and under whatever flag sailing, pirate, excepted, requiring of them only the payment of the duties, and obedience to the laws while under their jurisdiction, without adverting to the question whether they had committed any violation of the allegiance or laws obligatory on them in the countries to which they belonged, either in assuming such flag, or in any other respect.

In the differences which have subsisted between Spain and her colonies, the United States have observed all proper respect to their friendly relations with Spain. They took no measure to indemnify themselves for losses and injuries; none to guard against the occupancy of the Spanish territory by the British forces in the late war, or to occupy the territory to which the United States considered their title good, except in the instance of West Florida; and in that instance under circumstances which made their interposition as much an act of accommodation to the Spanish authority there as of security to themselves. They have also prohibited their citizens from taking any part in the war, and the inhabitants of the colonies, and other foreigners connected with them, from recruiting men in the United States for that purpose. The proclamations which have been issued by the Governors of some of the States and Territories, at the instance of the President, and the proclamation lately issued by the President himself, are not unknown to your Government. This conduct, under such circumstances, and at such a time, is of a character too marked to be mistaken by the impartial world.

What will be the first result of the civil war which prevails between Spain and the Spanish provinces in America, is beyond the reach of human foresight. It has already existed many years, and with various success; sometimes one party prevailing, and then the other. In some of the provinces the success of the revolutionists appear to have given to their cause more stability than in others. All that your Government had a right to claim of the United States was, that they should not interfere in the contest, or promote, by any active service, the success of the revolution, admitting that they continued to overlook the injuries received from Spain, and remained at peace. This right was common to the colonists. With equal justice might they claim that we would not interfere to their disadvantage; that our ports should remain open to both parties, as they were before the commencement of the struggle; that our laws regulating commerce with foreign nations should not be changed to their injury. On these principles the United States have acted.

So much have I thought proper to state respecting the relations existing between the United States and Spain. The restoration of the diplomatic intercourse between our Governments forms an epoch which cannot fail to be important to both nations. If it does not produce a result favorable to their future friendship and good understanding, to your Government will the failure be imputable. The United States have at all times been willing to settle their differences on just principles and conditions, and they still are. Of this I informed you in my letter of the 5th of May, as I likewise did Mr. Cevallos, in a letter of the 17th of July. It will be very satisfactory to the President to find that your Government entertains now the same disposition, and has given you full power to conclude a treaty for these purposes. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

PHILADELPHIA, February 22, 1816.

SIR: The letter with which you honored me on the 19th of last month, in answer to mine of the 30th of December and 2d of January, had two objects: the first to make known to me the complaints which this Government considers itself as having against Spain for a long time past; the second, to communicate the resolution of the President on the three points embraced in my notes mentioned above.

You state that the President would have wished that I should not have confined myself to bringing forward the complaints of His Majesty, but should have likewise proposed a reparation for those of the United States against Spain.

The claim for damages and injuries of which you speak would have been definitively arranged and settled if the diplomatic relations between the two Powers had not been interrupted since the memorable epoch of 1808; and this Government cannot but know that this interruption ought not to be imputed to Spain; His Majesty having made, from that time, the greatest efforts to maintain them pure and unaltered.

I have assured you verbally and in writing that His Majesty desired nothing so anxiously as to satisfy the United States for every injury they may have received from Spain, and to proceed to give this satisfaction with that generosity and high sense of honor which have at all times distinguished the Spanish character, and which have always shone conspicuously in the conduct of the Government of the King, my master; but all these points, as being anterior to the epoch I have mentioned in my notes, and since then pending between the two Cabinets, ought to be the object of a particular negotiation; and nothing is more natural or more conformable to justice and good faith than that, for facilitating this very negotiation, the state of things between the two nations should be reduced to the same footing on which it was at the epoch referred to, since, from that time, there has neither been any official correspondence between the two Governments, nor have the United States received the least injury from Spain; and if they have received any, it has been contrary to the will of His Majesty, and without his knowledge. Of this class, without doubt, is that which you mention in your note above cited; that is, that British troops and agents had been introduced into Florida, and had communication with the Indian enemies of this Republic in its last war with Great Britain. The rigorous neutrality which His Majesty has observed in the island of Cuba, East Florida, and his other possessions, ought to convince the President that the Governor of West Florida (who is, I suppose, the person to whom you allude) had like orders with the other chiefs to observe the most strict neutrality; and if he has failed in obeying them, he would have been severely chastised, had you have given to me the least intimation as to his conduct.

I will now pass to the second object of which your letter treats; that is to say, to the resolution which this Government has taken on the three points stated in my letters of the 30th December and 2d January.

The first was confined to a request that, in conformity to the principles I have stated, that is, that the affairs between the two nations should be placed on the same footing they were before the interruption of the diplomatic relations between them, His Majesty should be put in possession of that part of Florida which the troops of this Union had occupied. You were pleased to state, in reply, that this Government, believing that it had a well founded right not only to the part of West Florida which their troops had occupied, but to a greater extent of territory, comprehended in the limits of the viceroyalty of Mexico, had judged that, with the same propriety that the King, my master, occupied those possessions, the United States might retain that part of West Florida they held, until it was decided by a friendly convention to whom it belonged.

Permit me to observe that there is no parity in the cases. The country to which you allude, extending to the Rio Bravo, or del Norte, has been under the dominion of Spain, not only before and since France ceded Louisiana to His Majesty by the treaty of 1764, but from the time of the discovery and conquest of Mexico, without ever having passed by treaty to any other nation; whereas the Floridas ceased to be a French or Spanish possession, and passed into the hands of England, under the name of East and West Florida in the year 1763. They remained under the power of His Britannic Majesty, as such, until the year 1783, when, by conquest, the Spanish arms, and by solemn treaty, they passed under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty. From this you will infer that, be the interpretation which may be wished to be given to the treaty of retrocession of Louisiana, made between France and Spain in 1800, what it may, the two Floridas can never be directly or indirectly included in it; first, because these provinces being in the legitimate possession of England from the year 1763 to the year 1783, France could not cede them to Spain by the treaty of 1764—nor Spain retrocede them to France, not having received them from her, unless there should have been an article on this point, in which express and direct mention was made of the cession; and, secondly, because the two contracting parties (Spain and France) have declared in the most solemn manner, the first, that she did not cede to France any part of the Floridas—the second, that she had not acquired them by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, or of retrocession of 1800; nor had had the least intention to set up a claim to them. You know very well that, according to all the acknowledged principles of justice, no one can be put out of the possession of what he holds until the right of the person who claims it shall be proved and recognised; and that, by a natural consequence of this principle, Spain having been in possession of West Florida when the United States laid claim to it, it is proper she should keep it until this Republic shows a better right, which ought to be done in a friendly negotiation between the two Powers; and that it would be anticipating the negotiating to begin by taking possession of the territory, the right to which, so far as it respects the United States, ought to be the object of the negotiation itself. These are the grounds which support the first demand I made on you, in the name of His Majesty, in my letter of the 30th December; and I flatter myself that, reflecting on facts so well known, you cannot do less than consider them just.

I pass now to the second point. This is confined to asking the punishment, according to law, of those turbulent and seditious individuals who have taken up arms within the territory of this confederation, and from thence carrying desolation, destruction, and horror into the frontier provinces of the Crown of Spain; and not content with the atrocities they have heretofore committed, they are now actually engaged in recruiting troops, and preparing armaments in the bosom of this country, again to invade these provinces. I have named the ringleaders of these rebels, who have violated the neutrality and the most sacred laws of the United States, by the well-known fact of their having armed in their territory, and marched from thence, in military and hostile array, to subvert the peace and good order of the dominions of the King, my master. I have named Toledo, Bernardo Gutierrez, Doctor Robinson, and others, who perpetrated the horrible deeds at St. Antonio de Bexar; who recruited their troops in Louisiana, and even in the limits of New Orleans, and proceeded from thence, as an army, to assault the province of New Mexico; who committed there outrages never heard of even among savage tribes; and who, after being defeated, again took refuge in the territory of this Union, where they are now endeavoring to raise new forces to repeat the same excesses. Toledo, Bernardo Gutierrez, Dr. Robinson, and their followers, to this time, move about with impunity in Louisiana, and even in the city of New Orleans itself. The infraction of the laws of the United States, and the violation of the dignity and honor of the American people, of which they are guilty, is public and notorious, not only in this country, but in the whole world. I stated to you, in addition, on this point, that the ringleaders I had named to you were expecting considerable reinforcements from Kentucky and Tennessee, to undertake a hostile expedition against the neighboring possessions of my sovereign; and that I had advised that these reinforcements, composed of American citizens, were raised for the purpose of uniting with them.

You were pleased to state to me, in reply, on this point, that the President had determined not to take any part in the disputes which had arisen between His Catholic Majesty and the revolted provinces on this continent; and that, in conformity to this system, the Governors of different States, as well as the President himself, had issued repeated proclamations, directing that all those who set on foot, or promoted the recruiting of adventurers, with the design of invading the possessions of His Catholic Majesty, should be prosecuted according to law; that the information received at your Department, from very respectable persons, is, that the force collected by Toledo is very inconsiderable, and composed principally of Frenchmen and Spaniards, without the territory of the United States, where their laws do not reach; that my statements on this point are not circumstantial; and that as soon as I pointed out American citizens who promoted the expeditions, collected the troops, or facilitated the supplies to which I referred, and if these collections of troops, &c., were in the territory of this Union, they should be immediately dispersed, and the persons implicated should be prosecuted according to law.

To satisfy you on this point, with that simplicity and candor which belongs to me, I will divide into two classes these seditious persons of whom I have spoken to you in my notes. I will include in the first class Toledo, Bernardo Gutierrez, and Dr. Robinson, as violators of the neutrality laws of the United States—an infraction so notorious and so evident that I should do wrong to detain you in referring to the innumerable acts which demonstrate it in an incontestable manner. It is known to you, to your Government, and to the whole country, that, with the troops they individually raised three years ago in Louisiana, they marched in military array to invade the internal provinces of the viceroyalty of Mexico; the horrible assassinations they committed, particularly those by Bernardo Gutierrez at St. Antonio de Bexar, are known. And, finally, it is known that, being defeated by the troops of the King, my master, they took refuge again in this country, and that the Government of Louisiana permitted them to remain undisturbed in the very territory whose neutrality they had violated. This single fact is, in my opinion, a sufficient reason why the law should take hold on them before they leave the jurisdiction of the United States to renew melancholy scenes. But I will give to you even new proofs that these highway robbers have not ceased from that time to concert and to realize new projects against the tranquillity of the inhabitants of the dominions of the King, my master.

The annexed copies, marked Nos. 1, 2, and 3, of intercepted letters from Toledo, which have been officially sent to me, prove beyond doubt that Toledo had armed in New Orleans three vessels, in which he carried arms and munitions of war to give support to the insurrection in Mexico; and that he returned to that city, bringing back with him Herrera, who calls himself Minister Plenipotentiary from the revolted provinces to this Government, by asserting, in one of his said letters, that the United States only waited the arrival of the Minister of the revolutionists of Mexico to acknowledge its independence. The other ringleaders have done the same thing to deceive adventurers, both in and out of Mexico, and even citizens of the United States, seducing them by false assurances that their Government was decided to support them, and that it would proceed immediately to recognise as an independent Power that band of highway robbers and insurgents. From the extract of a letter from a person of the greatest veracity and the best character, now forwarded to you, marked No. 4, you will observe that Toledo had deferred his expedition against the provinces of the King, my master, as I stated to you in my note of the 2d January, as the thousand men he expected from Kentucky, and the three hundred from Tennessee, could not form a junction with him in less than twenty-four days; and in Nos. 5 and 6, you will see this information confirmed under a posterior date, advising me that a number of Americans came down from the States adjacent to Louisiana to join the expedition which Toledo had concerted; and that he (Toledo) would carry with him the engineer Laford, Savary, and one Soubenet.

You will also learn that provisions and a Carthaginian flag were sent to the American brig, the Tom Bowline, from New York, at the moment of her arrival at the Balize, by a gunboat of the United States, with the object, it would seem of conveying with her the vessels which should sail from New Orleans with munitions of war for the establishment at the new port of Tampico; that they had purchased in New Orleans itself five other schooners, which they are actually arming to cruise against the Spanish commerce; and that it appears that Mr. John K. West, merchant of that place, is the agent for these vessels; and, finally, that in that city there has been a revolutionary junta, at the head of which is Toledo and Herrera, from which has issued the wicked decree mentioned in these letters—that four honorable Spaniards should be put to death for every revolutionist punished by the established laws of the monarchy of the King, my master.

As respects Doctor Robinson, it is notorious that he has been one of the most infuriated enemies of Spain, and the one who has, with the greatest eagerness, promoted the rebellion of the provinces of His Majesty. It was he who introduced himself into the internal provinces to seduce their inhabitants; it was he who sowed the seed of insurrection; it was he who procured intelligence in St. Antonio de Bexar for Bernardo Gutierrez, that he might possess himself of the place, and afterwards murder fourteen Spanish chiefs; and it was he who published, in these United States, proclamations, signed with his hand, inviting adventurers from all parts to form an army, pointing out the places of enlisting men, and the pay of those enlisted; and, in one word, declaring war himself, in a certain mode, against the Spanish nation, from the very bosom of this Republic, as you will find more in detail in the authenticated copy (No. 7) which accompanies this, the original of which is in my possession.

I include in the second class those individuals who, seduced by the imposture of the principal author of these hostile expeditions, have assisted, from the bosom of this Republic, the revolutionists of Mexico—some by furnishing them arms and munitions of war, others by enlisting themselves, in this country, in the army of the insurgents, which passed over to subvert all order in the provinces of the King, my master. In this number are those other persons whom I have mentioned to you in this and my former notes. The information which I gave you respecting some persons who were preparing hostile expeditions from Georgia against the possessions of the King, my master, you find established, officially, by the Governor of East Florida, in his letter (No. 8) which accompanies this; in which he advises me that John McIntosh and William Criach, who supported the last insurrection in that province, in the year 1812, are now recruiting in Georgia a considerable number of vagabonds, again to invade the territory under his command.

I flatter myself that this series of acts, so circumstantial, the information of which has been acquired through channels so respectable, will be sufficient to call the attention of the President to the necessity of cutting up by the roots these melancholy abuses, and shut the door against the continual, violent movements of these turbulent people, who, from the bosom of this Republic, make war on a friendly and neighboring Power. It has never been the intention of the King, my master, to request that the punishment of the laws should be inflicted on these disturbers of social order when their guilt is not fully proven. On the contrary, I have informed you that the object of His Majesty is not to take vengeance on these highway robbers, but to shelter his subjects from their barbarity. His Majesty has only thought proper to solicit from the rectitude and circumspection of this Government what might prevent the crimes which are meditated from taking effect, as otherwise it might be too late to prevent them, as the offenders will be beyond the territory of a friend, and at a distance from the arm of the law. Good order requires not only that the offences already committed should be punished, but that those which are contemplated should be prevented; and this is the case of the individuals I have comprehended in the second class. The personal knowledge I have of the rectitude of the President inspires me with a confidence that he will view the acts I have just stated as I do, and proceeding, in this particular case, with that integrity and humanity which is the most glorious distinction of the American character, he will be pleased to adopt those measures which he may believe most analogous to the system which, you tell me, this Government has adopted, not to mix in these dissensions, and not to permit the citizens of this Republic to take part in them, nor to permit its territory to be a shelter to foreigners who try to make war on a friendly Power.

To the third point in my notes, intended to solicit from your Government that vessels from the insurgent or revolted provinces of Spanish America should not be admitted into the ports of the Republic, as well because none of those provinces are recognised by any Power in the world, as, because the obligations of friendship and good neighborhood demand that we should not in any way contribute to protect provinces or subjects who have revolted, you have been pleased to make known to me that the President, observing the change of government which had taken place among the revolutionists in Spanish America, had adopted the measure of ordering the collectors of the customs to admit every description of vessel, without regard to her character or flag, provided she paid the duties and observed the laws of the country during the time she was in port.

With due respect for the measures adopted by the chief of this confederation, I cannot do less than state to you that the changes of government which have taken place among the revolutionists of Spanish America do not appear to me to afford a sufficient motive for altering the friendly conduct towards a Power with whom one is in peace and harmony. You cannot but know that this measure places these factionists not only on a footing of equality with the Spanish nation, but gives them advantages over all independent Powers, since, according to the laws of neutrality, the United States would not permit any independent nation to arm its vessels in their ports, nor to sell prizes in them, as is permitted to these revolutionists.

By the two acts of Congress, one of the 28th of February, 1806, and the other of the 24th of the same month in 1807, all commerce with the rebels of St. Domingo was prohibited at the request of France. As the treaties subsisting between Spain and the United States place Spain on the footing of the most favored nations, His Majesty considers himself entitled to expect that this Republic will now adopt in his favor a like measure during the disturbances in Spanish America, or for such other period as it may be considered proper to designate. Such is the spirit in which I have made the three requests to your Government, stated in my former notes. I hope that the present observations will merit a favorable reception from the rectitude and wisdom of the President and of yourself. I have given an account to my Government of all these particulars, sending it a copy of my notes, and of the answer I had the honor to receive from you. And in the meantime I ought to reiterate to you the most positive assurances of the disposition of the King, my master, to maintain and to strengthen the ties of friendship and good understanding with these States.

At the conclusion of your note which I am now answering, you are pleased to make known to me that this Government is anxious to terminate, by means of a friendly negotiation with the King, my master, all pending differences, and that it will be very satisfactory to the President to know that I am vested with powers to that effect. I have not lost any time in communicating to my Sovereign this desire of the President, and I will have the satisfaction of announcing to you what His Majesty may determine on this point; nevertheless, I ought to state to you, that although it would be highly flattering to me to treat with you, as your penetration and rectitude would facilitate the arrangement of these affairs, yet it appears to me that, as Mr. Erving has not yet sailed from the United States, the business would be expedited if the President would give him power and instructions to terminate the negotiations at Madrid. This arrangement cannot present great difficulties. The respective rights of each Power being once settled by common agreement, a friendly understanding being had on each point in discussion, and it being determined what are the reciprocal obligations of Spain and the United States, they would be still further obviated if you would have the goodness to inform me, frankly and plainly, as I requested in a former letter, what are the pretensions of right which the United States have against Spain, and what are those for their own convenience, which they desire to realize for an equivalent which may be advantageous to the two nations, to the end that, with the knowledge I have acquired of the mutual interest, of both, I may recommend to the attention of His Majesty these particular points.

I renew to you my respects, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Chevalier De Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 10, 1816.

Sir: I had the honor to receive your letter of February 22d soon after its date, and to communicate it to the President.

Anxious as this Government has been to terminate all differences with His Catholic Majesty, on conditions of reciprocal advantage, and with equal honor to both parties, it would have been very satisfactory to the President to have found that you had been vested with full power to negotiate and conclude a treaty for these purposes.

I have the honor now to state that Mr. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to

His Catholic Majesty, has been instructed on these important subjects, and that, as the views of this Government are just and liberal, a strong hope is entertained that your Government, bringing to the negotiation a similar disposition, will agree to such an arrangement as will be mutually advantageous and satisfactory to both nations.

However agreeable it might be to leave these high concerns in this train, without further discussion here, it is, nevertheless, proper to notice some passages in your letter of February 22d, notwithstanding the clear light in which the subjects to which they relate have been placed in former communications. You intimate, in your late letter of May 30th, a desire to receive a particular answer to that of February 22d; and it is just that you should see that my silence was imputable to the cause only which is above suggested.

You state that, as that portion of Louisiana which lies eastward of the Mississippi and the Iberville, had been ceded by France to Great Britain in 1763, and by Great Britain to Spain in 1783, it could not be comprised in the cession of Spain to France in 1800, nor of the latter to the United States in 1803; and you draw this conclusion from the supposed import of the term "retrocession" used in the two latter treaties; which, you say, applies to that portion only which Spain had received from France. My interpretation of these treaties, taking into view so much thereof as relates to this subject, is very different. As to the term "retrocession," it is evident that it was not the intention of the parties that it should have any effect whatever on the extent of the territory ceded. The import of this term is too vague, and the term itself was used in a manner too casual to admit such an inference, even had there been nothing else in the treaty between Spain and France of 1800, to show that the construction you contend for is altogether inconsistent with the manifest intention of the parties. The import of this term would, in my opinion, be satisfied, if the whole province had passed in the first instance from France to Great Britain, and been conveyed afterwards by Great Britain to Spain, and by Spain back again to France. In regard to France this last conveyance would have been a "retrocession," as, by it, the territory would have been ceded back to her. It was very natural, therefore, that this term should be used, being applicable, in the most limited sense in which it can be taken, to at least nineteen-twentieths of the province, and, in a qualified sense, to the whole.

Had it been intended to exempt any portion of the province in the possession of Spain from the operation of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, it would have been easy to have done it, and in a manner to preclude all doubt of the intention of the parties. It might, for example, have been stated that Spain ceded back to France such part of the province as France had ceded to Spain. A stipulation to this effect would have been concise, simple, and very perspicuous; it would have rendered useless and unnecessary the other provisions of the article in regard to the point in discussion, and for any purpose whatever the first of these provisions; or they might have defined the extent of the cession by a natural boundary, which would have been equally distinct and satisfactory. Had Spain ceded to France all that portion of Louisiana which lies westward of the Mississippi, the Iberville, and the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, no controversy could ever have arisen between France and Spain respecting the eastern limits, as to what Spain had ceded in that quarter, and what she had retained; nor could there have been one between the United States and Spain. By declining to define the boundaries of Louisiana, eastward, in some one of these obvious and perspicuous modes, it is just to conclude that it was intentional; that there was an object in it; and what that object was is sufficiently apparent from a fair construction of the provisions of the article already noticed.

By the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, in 1800, the province of Louisiana is ceded to France by Spain, "with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." And by the treaty of 1803, between the United States and France, this article of the treaty between France and Spain is inserted verbatim, by which the United States are placed precisely on the same ground on which France herself stood.

If we recur to the several provisions, we shall find that each has a distinct object, for which it would not have been necessary to provide, especially in that mode, if it had been the intention of the parties that no portion of West Florida in question should have been exempted from the cession. By stipulating first that the province was ceded "with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain," direct reference was made to that portion of West Florida lying between the Mississippi, the Iberville, the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, and the Perdido. This provision cannot be construed as alluding to any other part of the province, and its sole effect was intended to be to include it in the cession to France. The second provision is equally explicit, "that it had when France possessed it." It is known that France had held the province to that extent before the treaties of 1763, by which she had ceded it to Spain and Great Britain; and by this stipulation it was ceded back to her in the same extent, so far as Spain could do it. The third provision has an object equally distinct, and is the more important, because, by giving it its intended effect, the construction given to the others is fully confirmed—"such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." By the treaty between the United States and Spain, in 1795, the boundaries, as established between the United States and Great Britain in 1783, and the free navigation of the Mississippi are confirmed, with the addition of the right of deposit at New Orleans. This provision applies to this treaty, and likewise to the treaty of 1783 between Great Britain and Spain, by which West Florida was ceded to the latter, whereby she was enabled to restore it, in the extent contended for, to France. In regard to its operation on the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, it was a provision which the United States had a right to expect from the good faith of Spain.

This view of the subject, which was in substance taken by the Ministers of the United States in 1805, in a negotiation with your Government at Aranjuez, appears to me, as it then did, to be conclusive. You urge, however, against it, that the French Government had stated that it was not its intention to cede to the United States that portion of Louisiana which France had ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of 1763. The same declaration was made to the Ministers of the United States at Aranjuez, in 1805, for the same purpose that it is now repeated. A just regard to the rights of the United States, founded on the cession which France had made to them, with a thorough knowledge of all the circumstances attending the transaction, combined with a due respect to the Government of France, dictated the answer. Your Government was informed that the American Envoys had proposed to the French Government, in the negotiation which terminated in the cession of Louisiana by France to the United States, in 1803, that its boundaries should be defined by the treaty; to which the French Government did not accede, preferring to insert in it an extract from the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, by which the province had been ceded by Spain to France, with intention to place the United States, in regard to Spain, on the same ground precisely that France held herself under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, unprejudiced by any opinion of her own. Nothing had occurred in the negotiation with France to excite a doubt that the Perdido was the eastern boundary of Louisiana. It had been the boundary of the province when held by France, before the treaties of 1763, and it was made so again by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, which restored it to her. Such was the construction which the American Ministers gave to that treaty, who were engaged in the negotiation with France; and such their representation of it to their Government, after the treaty with France was concluded. It merits particular attention that when your Government was requested to cede to the United States such territory as they were desirous of obtaining prior to their acquisition of Louisiana, it replied to their Minister at Madrid, by a letter of May 3, 1803, "that, by the retrocession made to France of Louisiana, that Power regained the province with the limits it had, saving the rights acquired by other Powers; and that the United States could address themselves to the French Government to negotiate the acquisition of territories which might suit their interest." With the subject thus presented before the Government of the United States, the fair construction of the article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, maintained by the American Ministers in their official communication accompa-by the treaty, sanctioned, as it evidently was, by the letter of your Minister of State, the Treaty of Paris of 1803 was ratified. It could not be expected that the United States would appeal, under these circumstances, to France, for information as to the extent of the acquisition which they had made, or be governed by any opinion which her Government might express, in that stage, respecting it.

With respect to the western boundary of Louisiana, I have to remark that this Government has never doubted, since the treaty of 1803, that it extended to the Rio Bravo. Satisfied I am, if the claims of the two nations were submitted to an impartial tribunal, who, observing the principles applicable to the case, and tracing facts, as to discovery and settlement, on either side, that such would be its decision. The discovery of the Mississippi as low down as the Arkansas, in 1673, led to its mouth, in 1680, and the establishment of settlements on that river, and on the bay of St. Bernard, on the western side of the Colorado, in 1685, under the authority of France, when the nearest settlement of Spain was in the province of Panuco, are facts which place the claim of the United States on ground not to be shaken. It is shown that nothing occurred afterwards on the part of France to weaken this claim. The difference which afterwards took place between France and Spain respecting Spanish encroachments there, and the war which ensued, to which they contributed, tend to confirm it.

I have thought it proper to make these remarks in reply to your letter of February 22d, respecting the eastern and western boundary of Louisiana. The subject having been fully treated in several notes to your Government in 1805, and particularly in those of March 8th and April 20th of that year, I beg to refer you to them for a further view of the sentiments of this Government on the subject.

In answering to the parts of your letter which relate to the revolted provinces of Spain in America, and the aid which you state the revolutionary party have derived from the United States, I cannot avoid expressing equally my surprise and regret. I stated in my letter to you of January 20th, that no aid had ever been afforded them, either in men, money, or supplies of any kind, by the Government, not presuming that the gratuitous supply of provisions to the unfortunate people of Caracas, in consequence of the calamity with which they were visited, would be viewed in that light, and that aid to them from our citizens, inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and with the law of nations, had been prohibited, and that the prohibition had been enforced with care and attention. You stated in your letter of January 2d, that forces were collecting in different parts of our western and southern country, particularly in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana, for the purpose of invading the Spanish provinces. I stated to you, in reply, that I knew of no such collection of troops at any quarter, and that, from information derived from the highest authorities, I was satisfied that none such had been made. I requested you to state at what points these troops were collected, and who were the commanders. You have sent me, in reply, extracts of letters from persons whose names are withheld, which establish none of the facts alleged as to the raising of troops in the United States, but recite only vague rumors to that effect. I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a letter on this subject, from Mr. Dick, the attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana, by which you will see how attentive the public authorities there have been to the execution of the laws of the United States, and to the orders of the Government, and how little they have deserved the charges made against them.

As I cannot doubt that you have taken erroneous impressions from the misrepresentation of partial or misinformed individuals, and that you have communicated the same to your Government, I rely on your candor to adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to place the whole subject before it in a true light. It is important that the effort which the President is now making to adjust our differences with Spain should have the desired result; and it is presumable that a correct knowledge of the conduct of the United States, in these circumstances, would promote it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Dick, Attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana, to Mr. Monroe, enclosed to Mr. Onís in the Secretary of State's letter of June 10, 1816.

NEW ORLEANS, March 1, 1816.

SIR: I have just had an opportunity of perusing the letters of the Chevalier de Onís, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, addressed to you under dates of the 30th of December and the 2d of January. As these letters dwell largely upon transactions affecting the neutrality of the United States, which are said to have occurred, and to be still occurring here, and as they charge the public authorities of this city with giving, in the face of the President's proclamation of the 1st of September last, protection and support to the enemies of His Catholic Majesty, I think it not improper to address you in relation to these charges.

It is affirmed by the Chevalier de Onís, "and it is," says he, "universally public and notorious, that a factious band of insurgents and incendiaries continue with impunity, in the province of Louisiana, and especially in New Orleans and Natchitoches, the uninterrupted system of raising and arming troops to light the flame of revolution in the kingdom of New Spain. All Louisiana," he continues, "has witnessed these armaments, the public enlistments, the transportation of arms, the junction of the insurgents, and their hostile and warlike march from the territory of this Republic against the possessions of a friendly and neighboring Power."

No troops at present are, or at any former period were, openly raised, armed, or enlisted, at Natchitoches, or at New Orleans, or at any other point within the State of Louisiana. Arms have been transported from this place, by sea and otherwise, as objects of merchandise, and probably have been disposed of to some of the revolutionary governments of New Spain. It has not been supposed here that there was any law of the United States, any provision by treaty, or any principle of national law, that prohibits this species of commerce. It was considered that the purchasing and exporting, by way of merchandise, of articles termed contraband, were free alike to both belligerents; and that, if our citizens engaged in it, they would be abandoned to the penalties which the laws of war authorize.

What is said, too, about the junction of the insurgents, and their hostile and warlike march from the territory of the United States against the possessions of Spain, is unfounded. In the Summer of the year 1812, a band of adventurers, without organization, and apparently without any definite object, made an incursion into the province of Texas, as far as San Antonio, by the way of Nacogdoches. No doubt many of the persons belonging to this party passed by the way of Natchitoches, but separately, in no kind of military array, and under such circumstances as to preclude the interference of the civil or military authorities of the United States, or of the State of Louisiana.

What could be effected in this respect was done; twice in the years 1811, '12, parties of adventurers, who had assembled between the Rio Hondo and the Sabine, (the neutral territory,) were dispersed by the garrison of Natchitoches, their huts demolished, and their whole establishment broken up.

The party that marched upon San Antonio assembled to the west of the Sabine, beyond the operation of our laws, and from thence carried on their operations. So far from troops, upon this occasion, assembling at different points, forming a junction within the territories of the United States, and marching thence, I am assured, by various and most respectable authorities, that, although it was generally understood at Natchitoches that some enterprise was on foot, it was extraordinary to see two of the persons supposed to be engaged in it together. The officer commanding at that time the United States troops at Natchitoches (Major Wolstoncraft) offered his services to the civil authorities in aid of the laws, and to preserve inviolate the neutrality which they enforce.

In consequence, several individuals found with arms were arrested; they alleged that they were hunters; and there being no evidence to the contrary, or rather no proof of their being engaged in any illegal undertaking, they were, of course, discharged. So well satisfied, indeed, were the Spanish authorities of the adjoining province that neither our Government nor its agents gave succors or countenance to this expedition, that, during the time they knew it to be organizing, they applied to the garrison at Natchitoches for an escort to bring in some specie, which was immediately granted.

Toledo, who, at the time of its defeat, commanded the party that penetrated to San Antonio, came to this city in the Autumn of 1814, when he was immediately arrested, and recognized to answer, at the succeeding term of the federal court, to a charge of setting on foot, within the territory of the United States, a military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territories or dominions of the King of Spain; six months having passed, and no testimony whatever appearing against him, his recognizance was delivered up.

After the discomfiture of the party under Toledo, no enterprise destined to aid the revolutionists of New Spain appears to have been set on foot from the vicinity of the United States, until late in the Summer of last year, when it was rumored that a party, under a person of the name of Perry, was forming for that purpose somewhere on the western coast of Louisiana. Upon the first intimation that this enterprise was meditated, steps were taken here to frustrate it. Nothing occurred to justify prosecutions or arrests; a large quantity of arms, however, supposed to be intended for this party, were seized on the river, and detained at the custom-house for several months; and Commodore Patterson, commanding naval officer on this station, instructed the officers under his command, cruising in the neighborhood of the suspected place of rendezvous, (Belleisle, at the mouth of Bayou Teche,) to ascertain the truth of the rumors in circulation, and, if verified, to use the force under their respective commands in dispersing the persons assembled, and in frustrating their illegal intentions. In obedience to these orders, the coast, as far as the Sabine, was examined, and no persons discovered. It is now ascertained that Perry, Humbert, and their followers, inconsiderable in number, passed separately through Attakapas, and assembled about two leagues to the west of the Sabine. Thence they embarked for some place on the coast of Mexico, were wrecked, dispersed, and their plans, whatever they were totally defeated.

I have in the foregoing detail, sir, given, partly from information entitled to perfect confidence, and partly from my own knowledge, a brief and hurried outline of two fruitless attempts of a handful of restless and uninfluential individuals, stimulated by the desire of aiding the cause of Mexican independence, or that of bettering their own fortunes. These are the only military enterprises against the dominions of the Spanish Crown that have drawn any portion of their aid or support from Louisiana: in both, the mass of adventurers was composed of Spaniards, Frenchmen, and Italians. I need not say that these enterprises, whether in aid of the revolutionists or merely predatory, were not only feeble and insignificant, but that they were formed under circumstances which forbid a surmise of their being sanctioned or connived at. Every man acquainted with the state of public feeling throughout the southern and western sections of the United States knows that had our Government but manifested the slightest disposition to sanction enterprises in aid of the revolutionists of New Spain, the the constitution of these provinces would not at this day be doubtful.

It is said that troops have been recently enlisted, and that expeditions have been preparing, or are preparing, in this city to invade the dominions of Spain. The enlisting of men and the preparing of enterprises, or the means for enterprises, of the kind spoken of, cannot be accomplished without means, or be carried on in the midst of a populous city in solitude and silence. Yet it is known, in the first place, that neither Mr. Toledo, nor Mr. Herrera had or have pecuniary means for such purposes; and, in the second, so far as negative proof can go, or so far as the absence of one thing implies another, it is most certain that no enlistments have taken place, and that no expeditions, or the means of expeditions, have been prepared or are preparing here.

A regard to truth makes it necessary to say that that is alleged respecting the arming and fitting out of vessels within the waters of Louisiana, to be employed in the service of the revolutionary governments against the subjects or property of the King of Spain, is unfounded. At no period since the commencement of the struggle between the Spanish colonies and the mother country have vessels, to be employed in the service of the colonies, been permitted to fit out and arm, or to augment their force at New Orleans, or elsewhere within the State of Louisiana.

On the contrary, it is notorious that to no one point of duty have the civil and military authorities of the United States directed more strenuously, or, it is believed, more successfully, their attention, than to the discovering and suppression of all attempts to violate the laws in these respects. Attempts to violate them by fitting out and arming, and by augmenting the force of vessels, have no doubt been frequent, but certainly in no instance successful, except where conducted under circumstances of concealment that eluded discovery and almost suspicion, or where carried on at some remote point of the coast beyond the reach of detection or discovery. In every instance where it was known that these illegal acts were attempting, or where it was afterwards discovered that they had been committed, the persons engaged, as far as they were known, have been prosecuted, while the vessels fitted out, or attempted to be fitted out, have been seized and labelled, under the act of the 5th of June, 1794; and when captures have been made by vessels thus fitted out and armed, or in which their force was augmented or increased within our waters, where the property taken was brought within our jurisdiction, or even found upon the high seas by our cruisers, and brought in, it has been restored to the original Spanish owners, and, in some instances, damages awarded against the captors. An enumeration of the cases in which individuals have been prosecuted for infringing, or attempting to infringe, our neutrality, in aid of the governments of New Spain, and in which vessels have been seized and labelled, under the act of the 5th of June, 1794, together with a list of the vessels and property restored to the original Spanish owners, (confining the whole to the operations of the year commencing March, 1815, and ending February, 1816,) will show more conclusively, perhaps, than anything else can, how totally without foundation are the complaints of Spain on this head.

Schooner General Bolivar, discontinued.
Schooner Eugenia, alias Indiana, condemned.
Schooner Two Brothers, restored.

Enumeration of vessels and property brought within the Louisiana district, captured under the flag and by the authority of the Governments of New Granada and of Mexico, labelled on the part of the original Spanish owners, and restored upon the ground that the capturing vessels had been fitted out and armed, or had their force augmented, within the waters of the United States.

1. Schooner Cometa, restored April, 1815.
2. Schooner Dorada, proceeds restored 16th May, 1815, $3,050.
3. Schooner Amiable Maria, proceeds restored 16th May, 1815, $3,850.
4. Schooner Experimento, restored 3d August.
5. The polacre brig De Regia and cargo, proceeds restored 18th December, 1815, $19,209 50.
- Schooner Alerta and cargo, being the proceeds of the capture of about eighteen small vessels, restored 18th December, 1815, $62,150 05.

Damages awarded to the original owners against the captors in the two foregoing cases, $55,272 97.

7. The cargo of the schooner Petit Milan, restored February, 1816, $2,444 31.
8. The cargo of the Schooner Presidente, February 4, 1816, $10,931 15.
9. Schooner Sankita and cargo, restored February 1, 1816, $37,962 94.

The preceding account of Spanish property restored to the original proprietors, after being in possession of the enemies of Spain, is defective, inasmuch as it does not comprehend the whole of the cases of restoration that have taken place within the period to which the detail is confined; the very hasty manner in which I have made this enumeration did not admit of a more accurate statement. The principal cases, however, are included in it. In several other cases, where the property was claimed for the original Spanish owners, the claims were dismissed, because it did not appear that any violation of our neutrality had taken place.

The capturing vessels were not armed, nor their force augmented within our jurisdiction; nor had the captures been made within a marine league of our shore. The principles that guided the decisions of the court, as well in restoring the property captured, where our neutral means had been used, as in declining all interference where that was not the case, manifest, I think, a disposition to, and an exercise of, the most rigid neutrality between the parties.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN DICK.

From the Secretary of State to George W. Erving.
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 11, 1816.

SIR: You will set out in discharge of the duties of your mission to Spain as soon after the receipt of this letter as circumstances will permit. Our relations with that country are, from many causes, becoming daily more and more interesting. They will require your assiduous and zealous attention as soon as you are recognized by the Spanish Government.

The restoration of the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries, long interrupted by causes well known to you, presents a favorable opportunity for the settlement of every difference with that Power. The President has already manifested his sincere desire to take advantage of it for that purpose, and hopes that the Spanish Government cherishes a similar disposition.

The primary causes of difference proceeded from spoliation on their commerce, for which Spain is held responsible, the justice of which she admitted by a convention; and from the refusal of the Spanish Government to settle on just principles the boundaries of Louisiana, and to compensate, on like principles, for the injuries arising from the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans in the breach of the treaty of 1795. The grounds of these differences have been so often discussed, and the justice of our claims so completely established in the instructions heretofore given, and in communications with the Spanish Government, that it is thought unnecessary to enter into them in this letter. Other injuries have likewise been since received from Spain, particularly in the late war with Great Britain, to which it may be proper for you to advert. I shall transmit to you, herewith, such papers relating to our claims in every instance, as will place their merits in a just light.

In a conversation with Mr. Onis, shortly after the late correspondence with him, he intimated that his Government was sincerely desirous of settling these differences, and that it might be willing to cede its claim to territory on the eastern side of the Mississippi, in satisfaction of claims, and in exchange for territory on the western side. He expressed also a desire that the negotiation might take place at Madrid, rather than in this city. It was expected that he had been already furnished with full powers to negotiate such a treaty, and it would be more agreeable to conclude it here if he had such powers, or might soon procure them, provided there was any ground to hope an early termination of it. But, from the experience we have already had, it may be fairly apprehended that a negotiation here would lead to very extraordinary delays, which it is wished to avoid.

The President will soon decide on the whole subject; after which, you shall be duly instructed of the course to be pursued, and of the measures to be taken. These instructions shall be forwarded to you at Madrid by Mr. Henry B. Smith.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 30, 1816.

SIR: To enable you to make the experiment on which the President has again decided to settle our differences with Spain, I enclose a letter of instruction, which, being shown to the Spanish Government, will be your authority for the purpose.

As the justice of the claims of the United States in every instance has been fully established in former discussions, the documents relating to which are in your possession, I shall not enter into the subject in that view. It can hardly be presumed that the Spanish Government, after what has passed, will be desirous of resuming this discussion. Should such a disposition be manifested, those documents will enable you to place the subject in a proper light. I shall proceed, therefore, to state the conditions on which the settlement may now be made.

The United States complained, in 1805, of injuries from Spain—

- 1st. By spoliations on their commerce;
- 2d. By the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans; and,
- 3d. By the refusal of the Spanish Government to settle the boundaries of Louisiana on just principles.

Of spoliations there were two classes: the first consisted of seizures made of American vessels by Spanish cruisers; the second, of seizures of other of our vessels by French cruisers, who carried them into Spanish ports, where they were condemned by French Consuls. For the first class, provision was made by a convention between the two Governments at Madrid, bearing date on the 11th of August, 1802, which the Spanish Government afterwards refused to ratify. For the second, no provision was ever made, though the claim was specially reserved in that convention. The suppression of the deposit at New Orleans was in direct violation of an article of the treaty of 1795. By the cession of Louisiana the United States claim (and, as they think, have proved by a clear title) all the territory lying between the Perdido, on the eastern side of the Mississippi, to the Rio Bravo, on the western. They well know that France would have claimed to the same extent had she not made the cession; though as the French Government declined defining the boundaries by the treaty, as was desired, no appeal was made to it by this Government, or thought proper afterwards respecting them.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, August 29, 1816.

Mr. Henry B. Smith arrived at Cadiz on the 26th of July, and at Madrid on the 10th instant; by him I received your letters of May 30 and 31, the new cipher, the special power to negotiate, and the other papers therein referred to. It was after duly deliberating on those and the several instructions which had preceded them, that I formed my first note to Mr. Cevallos; this was sent to him on the 26th instant, a copy of it (No. 6) is herewith submitted.

No. 6.

MADRID, August 26, 1816.

SIR: The President is sincerely desirous of establishing the relations of amity between the United States and Spain on a solid basis, and that every obstacle to a permanent good understanding between the two countries should be removed by arrangements honorable and advantageous to both; he does not doubt of finding corresponding dispositions on the part of His Catholic Majesty, therefore has readily acceded to the particular wishes of His Majesty by receiving Mr. Onis, and, in the same friendly confidence, has ordered me to repair to this Court.

I am specially instructed to discuss and to settle with your excellency all the ancient causes of misunderstanding, as well as the questions growing out of recent occurrences, which are of a character unfavorable to the object in view. It is desirable that no matter of future contention or jealousy should remain to put at hazard or to interrupt the good intelligence which the United States are always disposed to maintain with Spain, and to all the advantages of which His Majesty's Government cannot but be wholly sensible.

In transactions where the parties enter with such dispositions and such motives to accord, a frank exposition of all the grounds of complaint is at once the most just and the most judicious course; for to suppress or to smother any of them in condescension to temporary considerations, is but to leave the seeds of future discord, and to substitute palliatives and expedients for satisfactory and solid arrangements.

It is proper, therefore, that I should state distinctly all the points on which the United States seek for redress and indemnity, commencing with those claims which have heretofore been the subject of unsuccessful negotiation. I am well persuaded that the whole can now be settled in a manner satisfactory to both parties, and without reviving whatever animosities they may have originally given rise to.

In the present exposition I may also forbear to enter into the details of the principal subjects to which it refers; because these have, for the most part, in some form or other, been already brought to the view of the Spanish Government; and because your excellency, in particular, has the most perfect knowledge of them.

The first point to which I must call your attention is, the claim of my Government for compensation to its citizens on account of the ravages committed on their commerce previous to the year 1802; this is an object which the United States never have, and never can, lose sight of; indeed, the justice of the claim has already been admitted by the Spanish Government in a convention negotiated and signed by your excellency on the 11th August, 1802. The United States still expect that this claim shall be adjusted upon principles of law and equity, which cannot be called into question by His Majesty's Government.

In the same manner, the United States expect that compensation will be made for all the injuries done to their commerce, under the authority of the Spanish Government, or within its jurisdiction, previous to the date of said convention, not embraced by it, and the claim for which was specially reserved by that convention, as well as for all similar injuries subsequent to its date.

The suppression of the deposit at New Orleans in the year 1802, violating the treaty of 1795, forms another claim of great importance.

Causes of misunderstanding, of a later date, and of another character, accumulated principally during the war between the United States and Great Britain. These were of so unfriendly, and, in many cases, of so violent a nature, as to threaten an immediate and serious rupture between the United States and Spain; but, happily, the pacific policy which has uniformly characterized the conduct of the United States towards Spain was still upheld by considerations highly honorable to the moral character of the American Government—considerations growing out of the then unhappy domestic state of the Peninsula, and the miseries and disorders to which a most unjust foreign invasion had made it a prey; the American Government always trusting that Spain, on the re-establishment of its national independence, and the restoration of regular government and tranquillity, would readily attend to the just demands of the United States, and cheerfully embrace their conciliatory proposals.

It will suffice for the present that I mention but succinctly the principal matters above adverted to. These are—

1st. The encouragement which was given by the Spanish authorities in East Florida to the Indian tribes in Georgia, and generally on the southern frontier, to make war on the United States.

2d. The aid given to them in that war.

Relations with Spain.

3d. The aid afforded to Great Britain, by permitting supplies to be sent through East Florida to the Indian tribes; and afterwards by allowing her to establish a place of arms in that province, for the purpose of encouraging and supporting the Indians in their savage war.

These acts were evident and very important violations of the neutrality which Spain was bound to observe between the belligerents.

Her duties as a neutral Power were altogether lost sight of when the United States frigate "Essex" was attacked in the bay of Valparaiso.

The seizure of American property and the imprisonment of American citizens, in various modes and under various pretexts, both in the Peninsula and in the colonies, afforded unequivocal indications of an unfriendly temper. Several of these acts may hereafter require special representations on my part; my present object is to bring them generally to your view. The President relies upon the just sense which His Majesty must entertain of the important crisis in our affairs which such events are of a nature to produce for the adoption of a policy congenial to the interests of both countries; and the President persuades himself that the same just and amicable disposition will be prompt in affording the satisfaction required for the injuries complained of, and that thus a state of lasting peace and friendly intercourse may be secured between two countries whose relative situations and interests render that state so peculiarly desirable.

Finally, the questions respecting boundaries, which have heretofore been supposed to offer some obstacles to a settlement of other differences, the American Government considers as susceptible of amicable adjustment; and I am instructed to treat with your excellency on that subject. I have the honor to be, &c.

G. W. ERVING.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1816.

I wrote to Mr. Cevallos, on the 13th instant, a note (of which the enclosed paper No. 2 is a copy) inviting his attention to my note of August 26th; and, on the 14th instant, I again waited on that Minister, for the purpose of again urging him to reply to my said note. He made the same excuses for his delay as he had before made.

On the 15th instant I received from Mr. Cevallos a note of the same date; a copy of it (No. 3) is herewith enclosed; I also submit to you (No. 4) a copy of my reply, of the 19th instant, to that note.

You will observe, sir, that, under the circumstances of the sudden and unexpected determination of the King, as communicated by Mr. Cevallos, I thought it indispensably necessary (and my reasons will, I presume, be obvious to you) that my answer should include all that passed of importance in my intermediate conference with that Minister. I sought the interview for the purpose of obtaining promptly explanations which, in the ordinary course of correspondence, might not have been given for months; of ascertaining, as nearly as might be, the real views of this Government in the measure adopted, and, as far as possible, of fixing Mr. Cevallos in a direct and loyal course; in fine, of forcing our business on, by one mode or another, to a conclusion of some sort. Indeed, it was impossible for me to do anything more than merely acknowledge the receipt of the note, and to transmit it in course to my Government, unless I could learn whether the measure which it proposed was or was not likely to be acceptable to you; for I have not seen your note of June 10th, to which Mr. Cevallos refers; and as the words of his note, "que el citado Don Luis estuviere autorizado para negociar," are altogether equivocal, and may receive either a past or future construction, I did not feel confident that you had really invited Mr. Onis to send for powers. Thus, I could not but be apprehensive that the object of this Government in the measure proposed was merely to relieve itself from pressure here to gain time, and indefinitely to procrastinate the settlement of our differences; and this suspicion was strengthened by many collateral considerations.

You will perceive, sir, that Mr. Cevallos says, in his note, that "correspondent orders" have been sent to Mr. Onis; by which I must understand orders corresponding to the intention of the King to satisfy the President, by conforming to the desire expressed in your note to Mr. Onis, which must be understood to mean full powers; and yet, in conversation, he allowed that such powers had not been sent, and accepted of my proposal to transmit them. However, this apparent discrepancy may have been mere inadvertency; he may have intended duplicates of his powers. I resort to this supposition, because I have just now been informed, through another channel, that "full powers" have been sent to Mr. Onis. How the fact may be, you will be able to ascertain by the date of the powers. If the powers have been sent, (unless, indeed, very lately,) it is surprising that Mr. Cevallos did not earlier communicate the measure to me.

The observations which I made to Mr. Cevallos as to my own powers to negotiate, and my proposal of a special commission—these were intended rather to test his sincerity than to alter his professed plan. I said only what, under circumstances, it had been extraordinary to have omitted. My earnestness naturally resulted from the position in which I was placed by the proposed measure; but I refrained from pushing to the extent of which they were susceptible what might be considered as my own pretensions; for, independent of the doubt in which I was as to the real intention of your note to Mr. Onis, or, that out of question, of what might best suit the views of Government, my own decided opinion was that the negotiation might be carried on to much greater advantage, and brought to a conclusion much more expeditiously at Washington than here; not only because it would be in much abler hands than my own, but because Mr. Onís is there in a situation to see and to feel, with infinitely more force than Mr. Cevallos can in the midst of all his distractions here, the real importance, nay, absolute necessity, of a speedy adjustment of our differences. Certainly what fell from the Minister tended to strengthen that opinion; and it has been still further confirmed in a subsequent conversation. On the 21st instant, having reason to believe that he did not intend to reply to any part of my note of the 19th, I immediately called on him. I found, in fact, that the measure, which he had announced to me having been definitively determined on by the King, he considered any further correspondence on the matter as altogether superfluous; indeed, that he had but the most superficial, if any, acquaintance with the contents of that note. I then read to him a copy of it; and, having urged all the reasons which induced me to wish for his answer, he finally consented to give it. I now wait for that answer.

MADRID, September, 13, 1816.

SIR: It is my indispensable duty again to invite your excellency's attention to my note of August 26th. The importance and the urgency of the matters of which it treats will, I am persuaded, sufficiently explain my earnestness on this occasion; and I most ardently desire that the determination of His Majesty upon it may correspond to the just expectations of the American Government, and lead to the establishment of lasting peace and harmony between the two countries.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Cevallos to Mr. Erving.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1816.

SIR: Having laid before the King a note under date of the 10th June last, addressed by Mr. Monroe to Don Luis de Onís, in which he manifests the desire of his Government that Mr. Onís should be authorized to negotiate with him, His Majesty has acceded to it to gratify the President, and I have given the correspondent orders to the said Onís to the end that he may immediately enter into negotiation with Mr. Monroe, and employ all the means which are within his reach to secure a solid and durable peace, and good intelligence between the two nations. I renew, &c.

No. 4.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, Sept. 19, 1816.

SIR: By your Excellency's communication of the 15th instant, I learn that a note of Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State of the United States, under date of June 10, addressed to Don Luis de Onís, in which note the desire of the American Government is expressed that the said Don Luis should be authorized to negotiate with it, having been taken into consideration by the King, His Majesty, with a view of conforming to the wishes of the President, has acceded to the desire expressed in said note, and that you have sent the correspondent orders to Don Luis, to the end that he may immediately enter into a negotiation with Mr. Monroe.

I received this, your Excellency's important communication on the day of its date, but, before finally acknowledging the receipt of it, thought proper to seek, in an interview with you, such explanations as it seemed to require; for that purpose I waited on you on Tuesday, the 17th instant. I predicated what I then said to you on the supposition that the American Government might not have expressed a particular desire to change the seat of the negotiation, but that the Secretary of State, in the note of June 10, referred to by your Excellency, had but renewed the expression of his regret that Mr. Onís should continue to urge matters of complaint on which he had not such full powers to negotiate as he was understood to be in possession of previous to his reception by the President.

As I have the competent authority of my Government to treat; am in possession of all the documents necessary to be referred to in whatever discussions may arise; as your excellency is perfectly versed in all the questions which exist between the two Governments: for these reasons, it appeared to me that an arrangement might be made here, at Madrid, more expeditiously than at Washington. I stated expressly to you that I could, in no case, be under a necessity of referring to my Government for further instructions, requesting, at the same time, to know whether it was his His Majesty's intention to place Mr. Onís in a position equally favorable to a speedy adjustment of our differences. I concluded by excusing the warmth with which I pressed the subject, assuring you that I was very far from seeking any personal gratification in this matter of high public interest, but that I looked only to the desired result; and that if this could be obtained more promptly by transferring the negotiation to Washington than by pursuing it here, I should sincerely rejoice at the transfer.

In reply to these observations, I understood your excellency to state that, owing to your being actually charged with the business of three ministries, besides the direction of the posts, and to the variety of other occupations incidental to your high employ, it was impossible for you to give the time to the affairs to be discussed which would be necessary to a satisfactory and speedy arrangement of them; that Mr. Onís was also fully acquainted with those affairs, and was in possession of all the documents relating to them; and though you could not say but that it might be necessary for that Minister to consult with his Government, yet even the loss of three months' time on such an occasion would not prolong the negotiations to the extent which the unavoidable delays here would carry them to.

These reasons, urged by your excellency for transferring the seat of negotiation to Washington, induced me to propose that His Majesty would appoint a special minister or a commission to treat with me. I understood your excellency to reply that, as such minister or commission would be entirely uninformed, and would have everything to learn on the matters to be discussed, and hence the continual necessity of referring to you, this mode could in nowise expedite the result.

On my asking your excellency if full powers and instructions had been already sent to Mr. Onís, I understood you to say that they had not.

I then informed you that, after replying to your communication of the 15th instant, I should prepare to send a gentleman of my legation to the United States with my despatches; and I offered his services to be at the same time bearer of your despatches to Don Luis de Onís; which offer you were pleased to accept.

If I may have made any mistake in this statement of the substance of what passed in the interview which I had the honor of having with your excellency on Tuesday, the 17th instant, I beg that your excellency will be so obliging as to correct it.

I have further to request that you will be pleased to inform me whether it is your intention to reply to my notes of the 26th August and 13th September, or whether I am to consider your communication of the 15th instant as superseding the necessity of any special reply to those notes.

I have to request also that your excellency would enable me to inform my Government whether it is His Majesty's intention to send "full powers" to Don Luis de Onís to treat upon all the matters in question between the two countries, and whether the instructions to be sent to him will embrace all the points adverted to in my above-mentioned note of August 26.

As soon as possible after I shall be honored with your reply to this note, I shall send a messenger to my Government; he shall wait, however, to be at the same time the bearer of your despatches to Mr. Onís.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

GEO. W. ERVING.

First Minister of State, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, September 27, 1816.

You will perceive, sir, by my last communications, that there is now very little probability that I shall have occasion to use the ample documents with which I have been furnished. Whatever complaints this Government may have to make, those originating in Mr. Onís's reports will of course be sent back to him, to bring weight into his negotiations. It is equally probable that he may be instructed to answer at Washington to whatever representations I may find it my duty to make here; for it is now perfectly evident that a principal motive with Mr. Cevallos in removing the negotiation to Washington has been to get rid altogether of the weight and trouble of it here, and of whatever belongs to, or may any how be comprised in it. I hope that this was his only motive.

I see with satisfaction that your note of June 10 to Mr. Onís does not admit of any other construction than that which I conjecturally gave to it in my conversation with Mr. Cevallos. It is very evident, too, by Mr. Onís's reply of July 3d, that he has not misunderstood you. After this, is it to be imagined that Mr. Cevallos has fallen into a misconception? Certainly not. I presume, then, sir, that you will approve of my determination not to make any attempt to alter his plan, and that you will agree with me in opinion that the only chance of accommodation with this Government is by negotiation at Washington.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

OCTOBER 8, 1816.

In my despatch No. 18 I mentioned that Mr. Cevallos, in conversation on the 21st of September, had promised to answer my note to him of September 19th. He was afterwards for several days so wholly occupied with the marriage ceremonies, that not the least attention to any other kind of business could be expected; but these terminated on the 3d instant. I wrote to him unofficially a note, of which the enclosed paper (No. 1) is a copy; and on the 5th I again waited on him to press him for the answer which he had promised. On this occasion I observed to him that since, by his note of the 15th September, he had not assigned any sufficient motives for the determination of His Majesty to transfer the negotiations to Washington, it had been incumbent on me to ascertain what they might be, and to submit them to my Government.

It was with this intent that I had sought the interview of September 17th, and had stated the substance of our conversation in my note to him of the 19th, which, with his reply, would be sufficient for my purpose; that, without explanation, the mere notification of His Majesty's determination, contained in his Excellency's note, would have a very extraordinary appearance, to say the least: my Government had sent me with powers and instructions to negotiate; I had opened the matters to be treated on, and waited several weeks for an answer, when I was told His Majesty had determined to empower Mr. Onís. Under such circumstances, must it not be concluded either that the Spanish Government by this measure sought to avoid or to delay an arrangement, or that it had some personal objection to myself? Hence the necessity of an explanation. Mr. Cevallos answered that the motives to the measure were what he had before assigned, and that I must not allow myself to imagine that either the King or himself had the least personal objection to me; on the contrary, it would give him (Mr. Cevallos) peculiar pleasure to settle the business with me, if it were possible for him to attend to it; finally, that since I considered it important that my note should be answered, I should have the answer forthwith.

Yesterday, the 7th, I received the note of the same date, of which the enclosed paper (No. 2) is a copy. In this you will observe, sir, that Mr. Cevallos speaks of "full powers" to Mr. Onís, and the object in sending them to be the more expeditious termination of existing questions. In conversation, Mr. Cevallos told me that the instructions to Mr. Onís would comprise all the matters mentioned in my note of August 26th, but he has not thought proper, in this last communication, to reply specially to the question put on that subject in my note of the 19th ultimo; indeed, it was impossible for him to answer that note, and say less than he has done; he seems to have written merely to get rid of importunity, by tranquilizing what he supposes to be my personal apprehensions.

My despatches Nos. 18, 19, and 20, will accompany this as well as those of the Spanish Government for Mr. Onís, which are to be ready within a few days. Considering the peculiar importance of these communications, I have concluded to send them by Mr. Brent to the port of Bordeaux, from whence it seems to be more probable that a speedy conveyance for the United States will be found than either from Cadiz or Lisbon. Mr. Brent will proceed to the United States, if he should find a suitable vessel bound home. On account of the lateness of the season, I have thought it right to leave this point to his own discretion, instructing him however to make the voyage, (in whatever vessel,) unless he should find at Bordeaux some American going to the United States, under whose care he shall consider these despatches to be as perfectly secure as under his own.

I beg leave, on this occasion, to express to you my particular satisfaction with the services of Mr. Brent, who unites in his character all the qualities which make a man of business and a valuable public officer.

No. 2.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Cevallos to Mr. Erving.

SIR: In answer to your note of the 19th of the last month, I have to say to you, that the determination of the King that a full power should be sent to Don Luis de Onís proceeds from the desire of sooner terminating the pending disputes, and that it is unconnected with any personal considerations. I renew to you, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Chevalier de Onís, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 14, 1817.

SIR: Having understood in our late conference that you would not agree to an arrangement by which Spain should cede her claims to territory eastward of the Mississippi, unless the United States ceded their claims to all the territory westward of that river, and that even then your agreement would be restricted to a recommendation to your Government to adopt an arrangement to that effect, it is deemed unnecessary to make you any further proposition, or to prolong the negotiation on the subject of limits.

I have now to request that you will have the goodness to inform me whether you are willing to enter into a convention to provide compensation for spoliation, and for the injury resulting to the United States from the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans. I have, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Onís to the Secretary of State.

JANUARY 16, 1817.

SIR: I have received your official letter of the 14th instant, in which you are pleased to make known to me that, having understood in our last conference that I would not accede to an arrangement by which Spain should cede her pretensions to the territory east of the Mississippi if the United States did not relinquish theirs to the west of that river, and that even in this case my accession would be limited to recommending to my Government the adoption of this project, it appeared to you useless to make me more propositions to prolong the negotiation on the subject of limits between the two Governments; and you only desire to know if I am disposed to sign a convention to provide compensation for the injuries occasioned to the United States by the cruisers of His Majesty in the late war, and for those which resulted to the United States from the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans.

In answer to this letter, you will permit me to observe, that in the conference referred to I had the honor to exhibit to you the full powers of my Sovereign, in which he authorizes me to negotiate, adjust, and sign a treaty or convention with the United States, in which should be arranged not only the indemnities due to the subjects and citizens of both nations for the injuries they had suffered from the last war between His Majesty and Great Britain to the present, in contravention of the law of nations and the existing treaty between the two Powers, but also to fix the respective limits to the satisfaction of both. The intention of His Majesty (and in this I believe the two Governments agree) is not confined to a partial arrangement, which might leave in existence the disagreements which have unhappily arisen between them from the effect of circumstances. His Majesty, fully convinced that no treaty or convention can be durable unless it is founded in equality and mutual convenience, has particularly directed me that, keeping in mind the reciprocal, political, and commercial interests which unite the two nations, I should so adjust the definitive arrangement with the person whom the President should authorize to that effect, that no controversy could ever again arise between them.

Relations with Spain.

I cannot conceal from you that to arrive at this end it is indispensable to begin by amicably discussing and agreeing upon the rights of each of the two Powers, and that the result of this discussion is what ought to guide us in arranging the indemnities and fixing the limits which may be just and mutually convenient to the two nations. You had the goodness to say to me that this method had been adopted by you and Mr. Cevallos, and that, if we renewed it, precious time would be lost without our being able to agree. In such a dilemma, and anxious to contribute on my part to accelerate the negotiation, I took the liberty to propose to you the only other method which appeared to me to exist, besides the one which I have just mentioned, to arrange these differences, which is this: that the two Powers, throwing off all idea of aggrandizement, and sacrificing resentments and complaints of little importance, should proceed with good faith to fix limits between them which should be mutually convenient, which should not be liable to controversy, or be unknown to or violated by the respective subjects of each.

You did me the honor to applaud a proposition so frank and liberal, as dictated by equity and good faith, and made known to me with the same frankness that the United States desired to unite to its dominions all the territories which belong to Spain to the east of the Mississippi; and that for them they would offer to Spain those which were between the Rio del Norte and the Colorado. But as not only these lands, but all those which lie between the Colorado and Cape North, drawing a line by the river Mermento or Mermentao towards the Presidio of Adais, and from thence by the Arroyo Onda towards Natchitoches, are a part of the province of Texas, belonging to, and in the uninterrupted possession of, His Majesty, without there having been in relation thereto any dispute between France and Spain, (that dispute being solely as to Natchitoches, which fort the French raised unjustly in the territory of His Catholic Majesty,) it results that this proposition not only does not offer compensation to His Majesty for West and East Florida, whose cession the United States intimate would be very agreeable to them, but it involves the relinquishment of the property and possession which His Majesty has of the territory in the province of Texas, which lies between the Colorado and the vicinity of Natchitoches.

To propositions so distant from the equality and reciprocal convenience in which we have agreed to treat these affairs, I answered, that as the powers of His Majesty had been hastily sent to me by Mr. Cevallos, to take advantage of the departure of Mr. Brent, I have not received express instructions touching the entire cession of the two Floridas which the United States wished; and although they prove to me the desire of His Majesty to accommodate them in all arrangements which may be compatible with his interests, I saw myself obliged to wait for instructions on this point, of so much the greater importance, as it relates to the cession by His Majesty to the United States of the port of Pensacola, which was the key of the Gulf of Mexico—the best port of that gulf—and which was the more necessary to His Majesty for the security of his possessions; but that, in the meantime, if you should propose to me, on the part of this Government, to make the Mississippi the frontier, I should see in that proposition a disposition on the part of the United States to offer some equivalent, and I would recommend it to the consideration of His Majesty as a fixed and stable limit to assure the peace and tranquillity of the two nations.

I hope that you will recognise in this exposition the sincerity and ingenuousness with which I proceed, and that you will on a view of it adopt, of the two modes proposed for settling on foot the negotiation, that which will be most agreeable to the United States. The first—that is to say, that of discussing and agreeing upon the reciprocal rights and pretensions of the two nations—is the safest, and that which ought to conduct us with the greatest precision to the indemnities and to the establishment of limits between them; since nothing is more easy than that, each point of justice being agreed upon, the equivalent to it should be arranged upon principles of equality and reciprocal convenience. The second is shorter, but it requires a relinquishment of all views of aggrandizement on both sides; and that each Government, adopting as a basis the uti possidetis, either of the year 1792, which is the one fixed on by the allied Courts in the general pacification for the recognition of the right of property in their possessions, or that of the year 1763, after the conclusion of the treaty of peace between Spain, France, and England, (in which treaty the limits of their provinces were fixed, and the two Floridas were separated—the East from Spain and the West from France—by transferring them in full sovereignty to England,) may come to a just and friendly understanding, so as to do away these disagreements, I am ready to discuss with you in the first mode just referred to. I am also ready to treat with you by adopting the second; and I flatter myself that I shall in either case give you proofs that I will not depart from what is due to justice, equity, and the mutual convenience of the two nations.

I renew to you, &c.

LUIS DE ONÍS.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Chevalier de Onís.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 25, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 16th, in reply to mine of the 14th of this month.

It having been the invariable desire of the United States to settle all differences with Spain on just and fair conditions, it is seen with much regret that a similar disposition is not manifested on the part of your Government.

Finding by your letter that I had distinctly understood the views of your Government as explained by you in our late conference, and stated in my last letter, and perceiving also that you still adhere to those views, which, being altogether inconsistent with the rights of the United States, are inadmissible, I have to repeat that this Government has no motive to continue the negotiation on the subject of boundaries.

In making this frank declaration, I cannot avoid expressing my surprise that you should now find it necessary to refer again to your Government for instructions on any part of this subject. These differences have long existed, and as far back as 1805 were fully discussed, as you readily admitted, in every circumstance appertaining to or connected with them, in a special mission to Madrid for the purpose. It was hoped and expected, on the restoration of the diplomatic intercourse between the two nations, that you would have been invested with full power to settle them; and it was in accord with your views, when this was found not to be the case, that the requisite authority was given to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid. It could not have been doubted, as your Government had not authorized its Minister here to bring these controversies to a conclusion, that the Minister of the United States would have been promptly met in his offers to effect it at Madrid. I need not repeat to you the great disappointment which the President felt, when, after the lapse of so much time, he was informed that an expression of regret in my letter to you of the 20th of June, at the delay resulting from your want of powers, and from the necessity of transferring the negotiation to Madrid, had been misconstrued into a desire that it should be transferred again to the United States. On examining, however, the tenor of your commission, and the communications between Mr. Cevallos, both of which seemed to contemplate a prompt conclusion of the business here, the idea now brought forward in your letter, of a further resort to your Government for other instructions, was surely the last to enter into the anticipations of this Government.

It is proper to add, that I understood you to concur in our late conference, fully with me in the sentiments that any further discussion of subjects, which had been already so often discussed and completely exhausted, would be useless, since it could not be presumed that any change of opinion on any point would take place on either side. Each party understands its rights, and has, doubtless, made up its mind as to the conditions it is willing to adopt. To those suggested by you, as being worthy the consideration of your Government, this Government cannot agree.

Under these circumstances, I have again to request that you will do me the honor to inform me whether you are willing to conclude a convention to provide indemnity for spoliations, and the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans, as mentioned in my last letter.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

CHEVALIER DE ONIS.

Mr. Onis to the Secretary of State.

FEBRUARY 10, 1817.

SIR: I have received the official letter which you did me the honor to address to me, under the date of the 25th of last month, stating that, notwithstanding the desire the President had to adjust all differences between Spain and the United States on just conditions, and to their mutual convenience, it was seen, with great regret, that a like disposition was not manifested on the part of Spain.

You support this opinion on the ground that I adhere to the same sentiments which my Government manifested in former times; and also that the President, seeing the powers with which His Majesty had been pleased to honor me, could not comprehend why I should think it necessary to recur to my Sovereign to obtain new instructions. You will permit me to observe, that the number of privateers armed in the ports of this country, to cruise under an unknown flag against Spanish commerce, have obstructed, in such a manner, the communications between the Peninsula and these States, that the accidental circumstance of Mr. Brent's having taken charge of the duplicates of His Majesty's powers has alone obtained for me the receipt of them, and that I am even yet without the originals; with which, doubtless, His Majesty sent me instructions, and communicated to me his reasons for transferring the negotiation here. I can assure you that I am entirely ignorant of what has passed in Madrid between Mr. Erving and Mr. Cevallos, and that I am not less so of the motives which have induced His Majesty to transfer the discussion here, notwithstanding I had informed him that I had myself proposed to you that authority and instructions should be given to Mr. Erving in relation to it, it being clear to me that His Majesty desired nothing with more anxiety than to see an affair terminated which must be the precursor of the reciprocal intimacy which should be established between the two Governments for the mutual benefit of their respective subjects and citizens.

If I might be permitted to conjecture the motives which have induced His Majesty to transfer the negotiation here, I believe I should not mistake in designating, as the principal one of them, the knowledge His Majesty has of your talents, of your justice, (justificacion.) and of the conciliatory disposition which you manifested in your conferences with Mr. Cevallos to concur in the settlement of these discussions; and, as the second, this: that in the moment of the arrival of the Queen, his august spouse, and of the festivities incident to this happy event, His Majesty could not give the attention which was requisite to these affairs, which he considered of the first importance. You are too just not to appreciate these motives, and not to see in them nothing but a new proof of the anxiety of His Majesty to avoid all delay or inactivity. The President, informed by you of these motives, will, I flatter myself, form the same opinion, and see the necessity of my waiting for the necessary instructions from my Sovereign, before I subscribe to the points which ought to form the basis of this treaty. The short delay which may result from this will be amply compensated for, and with mutual advantage, if you would place me in a situation to inform my Government of the principal points on which the Government of the United States wish to see this negotiation turn. You know that as yet you have only made known to me, in our first conference, that if we were to go into a discussion of the rights of the two Powers, as was done by you and Mr. Cevallos, much time would be lost, and each of us would retain his opinion. You know that I agreed to this, but at the same time intimated that I saw no other more certain mode of accomplishing the object which the two Powers had in view, since it must be with a knowledge of the respective rights of each party that we ought to begin in fixing the indemnities and compensations which belonged to each on the principles of equity, justice, and convenience; and that the only way of avoiding this, and of shortening the negotiation, would be that the two Powers, giving up all pretensions and all idea of rivalry or aggrandizement, should agree between themselves, in good faith, to fix their limits according to equity, justice, and mutual convenience, so that they should not be liable to be violated by the subjects of the one or the other, and in a way to avoid the renewal of the complaints which had given rise to misunderstandings. You approved an idea so liberal, so generous, and so demonstrative of the disposition of the King, my master, to accommodate the United States in whatever might be agreeable to them, if not incompatible with his interests; and, in consequence, you made known to me that the United States wished to unite to their dominions the two Floridas. As, in the former negotiations, the cession of West Florida to the Rio Perdido was alone spoken of, and as His Majesty was ignorant of the new desires of this Government, I said to you that, although I did not positively know whether His Majesty would deprive himself of East Florida, and of the important port of Pensacola, which was the key of the Gulf of Mexico, yet the desire of His Majesty to gratify this Government was great, and that it was very probable he might agree to do it, provided that, on the part of the United States, there should be offered to him a just equivalent, and one of reciprocal convenience.

I leave it to your impartiality and justice, and to that of the whole world, to say if, on the part of His Majesty, a more positive proof is wanting of the interest which he takes in arranging these affairs in a friendly manner; and if I should not find myself more authorized to doubt of equal dispositions on the part of the United States, in consequence of the proposition which you made me, not only of not giving anything in exchange for the two provinces, and the cessions of which the United States desire, but requiring that His Majesty should cede to them a part of another, which has been in the uninterrupted possession of His Majesty for more than two hundred years.

I am nevertheless, very far from judging it thus. A firm and permanent arrangement of all points of difference is equally useful and necessary to both nations. It ought to fix the basis of the happiness of their respective subjects and citizens; and, to obtain this, it ought necessarily to be founded in justice, equity, and mutual convenience. His Majesty is disposed to conclude it on these terms; and he has too much confidence in the well-known rectitude of this Administration to think that it could solicit it on other terms.

You are pleased also to inform me, in your esteemed note, that to the propositions which I have suggested as worthy of the consideration of my Government, that of the United States cannot agree; and that, abandoning the arrangement of limits, you desire only to know if I am disposed to sign a convention for settling the injury sustained by the American commerce, and for the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans.

As the propositions which I have made to you were confined solely to the leaving to your election whether we should treat by discussing and fixing in a friendly manner the respective rights of each Power, to the end that, having agreed to them, and the obligations of each upon the other being known, the compensation to which each may be entitled might be settled; or that, leaving things to remain in the state they were, we might agree in a friendly manner as to what would suit each, I cannot conceive that the United States should be of opinion that they cannot agree to any of these points.

I would offend my own delicacy if, after being assured by you that the United States were disposed to terminate all the differences which exist between the two nations by a treaty founded on justice, equity, and mutual convenience, I could believe that the United States would repel the only means which, in my opinion, exist to arrive at this end. I judge, then, that I have not explained myself with sufficient clearness, or that I have not well comprehended you; and I again renew my propositions in a plain, clear, and demonstrative manner, giving you an example which you cannot but find just.

Let us suppose (and it is a very proper supposition) that you and I are intimate friends; you have purchased an estate adjoining one of mine; (I do not now inquire whether you purchased it from a person who had a right to sell it or not—but you purchased it;) and, be it because some officious person said so, or because you thought so, you were of opinion that there was included in this purchase a part of my estate, which I worked, took care of, and possessed. As soon as you had made this purchase, and observed that possession was not given you of the land I worked, and which you believed to belong to you, you asked me to give it up to you. I observed to you that it was mine; that the land which you had purchased had also belonged to me formerly; that I had ceded it to him who had sold it such as he had delivered it, and in no greater extent; and that, consequently, he could not transfer to you more than I had given to him. You and I refer to the seller, and he tells us that he never sold the land to you which you require, and never obtained it from me, nor had an intention of acquiring it. Notwithstanding this declaration, which is decisive and irrevocable, I, from motives of friendship for you, and to do away all doubt on the point, propose to you that we should discuss the affair in a friendly manner, and assure you that, if you present to me unquestionable documents to prove that it belongs to you, I am ready to give it up. I ask you, dispassionately, if this proposition could be considered as inadmissible? I go further. I, who am anxious to accommodate you, because you are my friend and a good neighbor, knowing that you desire to get part of my territory to round out yours, and to facilitate the exportation of your produce, as there is a navigable river passing through it, carry my friendship and condescension so far as to say to you that we will agree between ourselves, by a friendly investigation, what belongs to each; and, this being settled, I am ready to cede to you the lands you desire for an equivalent founded in equity, justice, and reciprocal convenience, fixing the limits between us in such a way that our servants should not engage us in quarrels and contests, as, it being our desire to live in the greatest harmony, we were equally interested in avoiding every subject of difference. Will you say to me that these friendly propositions are inadmissible? I believe not. Such, then, neither more nor less, are those which I have suggested to you in my former official note, and renew to you by this, hoping that, taking them into serious consideration, you will view them as just, equitable, and even generous.

You cannot but know that the convention you propose, limited to the indemnification for injuries done to the American commerce by the cruizers and tribunals of Spain, and by the suppression of the deposits at New Orleans, will not accomplish fully the object which the two nations propose to themselves, of extinguishing all disagreements. Nevertheless, to give another proof of the deference of His Majesty to the wishes of this Republic, I agree to enter into negotiation with you on these two points, and to conclude a convention as to them, in which shall be embraced the just reclamations which His Majesty shall produce against this Government, and the various arrangements he desires to place in it for the encouragement of the commerce between the two nations, and to avoid injuries such as those which, from the want of explicitness in the last treaty, have been experienced by the respective subjects of both. I will add more, and it is, that the first point to which you refer being founded in the treaty which exists between the two nations, I will subscribe to it without difficulty; and as to the second, it is of so small an amount, that if I do not succeed in demonstrating to you that these injuries have not existed, or that they are much exaggerated, and that the United States have already admitted that they were satisfied for them, I will have no difficulty even as to them. I ought, likewise, to observe to you that it will be easy to include in this same convention or treaty a provisional arrangement of limits, without detaining us to fix them with exactitude. If the United States do not desire to make an essential change in the established limits fixed by the treaties of 1763, 1764, 1783, 1795, and 1800, and that this arrangement should only apply to the uncultivated lands to the north of the Missouri, the boundaries of which were never settled between France and Spain, this question might be left for commissioners named by each party, and their decision might be considered as part of the convention; but, in any case, the most efficient method of concluding these affairs will be, that you should have the goodness to say to me, with frankness, what are the real views of the United States, what are the real and true compensations they are disposed to offer for the country they desire to obtain from His Majesty. You may be assured that I will support, earnestly, proposals that are just and reciprocally convenient, and that, on the return of the courier, I shall be able to sign, under the powers I now have, a treaty mutually satisfactory to both parties, we, in the meantime, agreeing upon all the articles of minor considerations. You cannot but know that the instructions ought to be adapted to the greater or lesser territory of His Majesty, which the United States may desire to add to their dominions; and that, if they desire none, little difficulty can occur on the subject of indemnities between two Powers animated by conciliatory and just sentiments. I am, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 20, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 10th instant.

From full consideration of the contents of this letter, it appears that, although you expect instructions at an early date to negotiate and conclude a treaty for the adjustment of all differences between the United States and Spain, which you manifest a desire to accomplish, you do not consider yourself authorized to do so on any one point at this time. I will thank you to state whether I have understood correctly the idea which you intended to convey. In case I have, I have only to remark that, although the delay is particularly to be regretted, it is not perceived that any advantage can be derived from entering into the negotiation before you have received your instructions. I have, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Translation of a letter from the Chevalier de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1817.

SIR: In the official letter which you did me the honor to direct to me yesterday, you state that you had taken into consideration the contents of mine of the 10th instant; and, confining yourself to one point only out of many on which it touches, of the greatest importance, as I think, to the interests of both nations, you say that if you had correctly understood the meaning of my letter, at the same time that I manifest a desire to conclude a treaty for the adjustment of all the differences existing between Spain and the United States, I do not consider myself authorized to do so until I receive the instructions from my Sovereign, of which I am in daily expectation. You ask me if this is the true idea which I had wished to give you, and add that, if it is, although we must both lament the delay, it is not perceived that any advantage can be derived from entering into the negotiation until I receive my instructions.

In my note above mentioned, I made known to you, with the candor and sincerity which characterize me, the causes to which I attributed the delay in receiving the instructions consequent on the powers which His Majesty had given me; and I do not doubt that the President will have found them as just as the reasons I stated to you, demonstrating that a partial negotiation, which did not embrace all the points of disagreement between the two nations, cannot accomplish the object of the one or the other—which is to get clear of these disagreements, and to take care that they are not renewed in future. The treaty in question ought to provide for the just reclamations of the subjects and citizens of the respective parties; in it the limits between the two Powers should be fixed agreeably to their respective rights, to equality, to justice, and reciprocal convenience. Finally, it ought to comprehend different stipulations analogous to the new state of relations of intimacy which is about to be established between the two Governments for the greater encouragement of their reciprocal commerce. You know that all these points have so intimate a connexion with each other that it is not easy to separate them; and, on the other hand, they are of such importance that I consider it necessary to wait the arrival of my instructions before I conclude definitively a treaty involving affairs of such magnitude. Nevertheless, as we cannot but feel this delay very sensibly, which most probably will be short, anxious on my part to lessen it so far as depended on me, I have suggested to you that we might begin to discuss the points of least importance, to the end of having the work in a state of forwardness when the instructions should arrive; but, since you prefer waiting for their arrival, I will agree to what you may resolve on, persuaded that you do not take less interest than I do in fixing the relations of amity between the two countries on a footing the most solid and durable.

PHILADELPHIA, July 9, 1817.

SIR: I am under the necessity of calling your attention, and that of the President, to what has occurred at Baltimore, in relation to the two privateers or pirates which have lately entered the bay of Chesapeake, and now are within the proper limits of the State of Maryland; the one commanded by Captain Taylor, and the other by Captain Stafford. It is notorious that these privateers, manned and armed in the ports of the Union, sailed on a cruise against the Spanish commerce, and have returned to the waters of Maryland with a part of the plunder and booty they have taken on board of Spanish and Portuguese vessels.

For the due conviction of this outrage, the necessary orders or warrants were sent, at the request of the Consul of His Catholic Majesty in Baltimore, to the marshal of that city, to proceed to the arrest of the aforesaid privateers, and for its execution a gunboat was granted by the collector of the customs. All this, however, was in vain; the marshal gave no effect to the orders issued for this arrest; and His Majesty's Consul, seeing that eight days had passed without the marshal taking a single step to fulfil the orders he was charged with, called upon him, and claimed their execution; upon which he replied, categorically, "that he was unwilling to proceed to the arrest of the said privateers, because it was not his duty to execute it, except they had entered the port of Baltimore; but by no means in the bay, although within the district of the State." The Consul lately applied to the district attorney, complaining of this conduct; and he acknowledged that indeed it was very extraordinary, but he took no steps to remedy it, or to enforce the observance of the laws of the United States in a case of so scandalous an example. These facts speak for themselves, and the mere statement of them is sufficient to make you and the President thoroughly sensible of the monstrous consequences which the irregular conduct of this marshal may lead to. It is perfectly evident that the public treaty between Spain and the United States, and the late act of Congress, sanctioned as a general law for the more strict observance of the neutrality of the same States with foreign Powers, are scandalously trampled under foot in Maryland; and that the marshal, by formally disobeying the lawful authority of the State, and that of the General Government of the Union, protected the hostilities and piracies carried on against the trade of a nation in a state of peace and amity with the United States. I cannot, therefore, do less than to remonstrate in the name of the King, my master, against so manifest a violation of the neutrality of this Republic, of its laws, and of the treaty existing between the two Powers; and to request that you will be pleased to obtain of the President the most prompt and effectual orders to cause the marshal of Baltimore to do his duty, and all requisite justice to the subjects of His Majesty.

It is my duty, also, to call your attention and that of the President to the conduct of the adventurer, Sir Gregor McGregor, who, since he was in arms with the bands of insurgents in the province of Venezuela, has come to these States, and been constantly engaged in enterprises to invade or disturb the tranquillity of His Catholic Majesty's possessions in that part of the world. He lately recruited in Charleston a great number of adventurers, and among them several persons of note, viz: one Rouse, son of a colonel of that name, an inhabitant of that city; one Champion, who was a commissary in the service of the United States in the late war, and storekeeper of ordnance; one Heath, a lawyer of the same place; and many others whose names I pass over. He purchased, under a borrowed name, a brig of considerable burden, which he despatched with passengers to New Orleans on the 19th of last month; and on the following day he went on to Savannah in the stage, according to common report, to recruit more people. His subsequent proceedings and hostile preparations in the bosom of this Union, against the possessions of the Spanish monarchy, are notorious, and announced with a scandalous publicity in many papers of these States. I hope, then, that you and the President will apply the energy of your zeal for good order and the observance of the public laws, by restraining these excesses and vexations, which compromise the neutrality which the President has proposed to preserve in the dispute subsisting between the King, my master, and some of his provinces in rebellion, and render null, as you may imagine, the security in which the Government of His Catholic Majesty rests, in a reliance on the safeguard of the said laws, and on that of the general principles of public good faith, which serve as the basis of the tranquillity and friendly intercourse between the nations and Governments of the world. I renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Mr. Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, July 16, 1817.

SIR: Since the happy restoration of His Majesty to the throne of his august progenitor, one of his principal objects has been to establish, upon solid foundations, his political relations with the several Powers friendly to Spain, by removing whatever obstacles were of a nature to affect their future good understanding.

From the beginning, the state of affairs between Spain and the United States called His Majesty's attention; and as soon, during the last year, as reciprocal organs of communication were established by the recognition of their respective Ministers, the King announced his desire of making evident the right of each Power on the different points of existing reclamations.

In your note of August 26th of the last year, addressed to my predecessor, you also manifested that you were equally disposed to enter into the discussion in behalf of your Government, and to conclude a treaty honorable and satisfactory to both parties, to which end you intimated that you were authorized by ample powers and instruction; but as the various questions depending between the two Governments, and the incidents of later years, which had complicated them, formed a total of objects which appeared to require a prolix examination, His Majesty thought that this might be made between his Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington and the American Secretary of State, with more despatch than in Madrid, where the Government of His Majesty found itself at the time surrounded with a multitude of pressing engagements, arising from the necessity of re-establishing the order subverted by foreign invasion, and by the very extraordinary means which had been adopted to repel it with success.

The Minister of the King in Washington was perfectly acquainted with all that happened of late years; he knew to the foundation all the rights of Spain upon each of the depending questions; he was aware how well disposed was the mind of His Majesty to attend to the reclamations of the American Government, which might be founded on justice, and even to accede to those in which he might voluntarily please the United States without injury to his vassals or to the rights of his Crown. It was, therefore, thought right to authorize him with full powers, and to make him aware that, after entering into an examination and discussion corresponding to the tenor of what he knew respecting the rights of Spain, he should proceed to an adjustment, taking for a basis the demonstrated right of each party upon each of the points discussed.

But it appears that the Government of the United States has deemed it to be superfluous to enter into an ulterior discussion of said points, after that which had taken place at a former period; and it appears also to have intimated its desire of an arrangement or conclusion upon the whole, jointly, of the respective pretensions, in which, without losing sight of the foundation of each, considerations of mutual convenience should be equally attended to, and to fix the basis of an order which could not be easily changed in future.

For this kind of arrangement, by way of conclusion, the Minister of His Majesty thought that competent instructions were wanting to him; and in fact he was in need of those which were much more detailed than those he already had, since they were intended to terminate the business, taking for a basis only the examination and knowledge of the rights of each in the different objects which the negotiation embraces.

Soliciting more ample instructions, the Minister has sent to Madrid the Secretary of his Legation, Don Luis Noeli, and His Majesty has ordered that they be prepared and arranged with all possible despatch. But as in this course, which it is desired to give to the negotiation, it is perhaps possible that you and I can arrive more readily at a result, seeing what you state in your notes of 26th August and 19th September upon the business, my desire to do whatever may contribute to a satisfactory termination induces me to ask you to please to explain whether you continue authorized to enter into conference with me, and even to conclude an arrangement on the matter; for, in this case, without failing to send to His Majesty's Minister a Washington suitable instructions, which the said Secretary of Legation will carry, we can also occupy ourselves in the same business, and perhaps arrive at a definitive arrangement with more promptitude than the Minister of His Majesty at Washington, who, by some occurrence or proposition made to him, not foreseen in the instructions, may be put to the necessity of again consulting His Majesty, and thus creating delay, which cannot happen with me, who have the honor to receive daily the orders of the King.

If you feel yourself authorized to this effect, our progress in this business may be substantially the same as indicated in your note of the 26th August; for though, in the projected arrangement, we take for our guide considerations of reciprocal convenience, and the desire to avoid the reproduction of motives of disagreement for the future, a consideration of the respective rights of our Governments in the questions depending can never be lost sight of, as you also indicate in your said note; to the end that the sacrifice or relinquishment which each may think it proper to make should be correspondent and proportionate to what he may exact from the other in return.

If we shall succeed in forming the arrangement which we desire to conclude, in a perfect knowledge of the right of each, modified by considerations of reciprocal utility, it cannot be but firm and durable, and consolidate a good understanding between the two nations, both of which are interested in preserving it.

I profit of this occasion to renew to you assurances of my high consideration, and pray God, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro.

MADRID, July 19, 1817.

SIR: I had yesterday the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 16th instant.

Adverting to a late correspondence between the Secretary of State of the United States and the Chevalier de Onis, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty, your excellency seems to conclude that the American Government hath declined to enter into an "ulterior discussion" of the several points of difference which present themselves for adjustment between the two countries, and to have intimated a wish to make an arrangement founded upon an aggregate view of their respective pretensions, in which, without forgetting the principles on which the right of each reposes, a due regard should be observed to considerations of mutual convenience.

For this class of arrangement you allow that Mr. Onis had not sufficient instructions; those which he had, authorizing the termination of a negotiation only upon the basis of an examination and recognition of the rights of each party on each of the several objects which the negotiation should embrace.

But it appears, from the correspondence adverted to, not only that Mr. Onis did not conceive himself to be authorized to negotiate and sign a treaty of the kind indicated, but that he was not empowered to negotiate and settle a convention on any separate object; for, by the Secretary of State's letter to him of January 4th, he was expressly invited to enter into such arrangement respecting two important points.

In fine, it distinctly appears that Mr. Onis found himself empowered to discuss every point, but not to conclude on any one separately, or on the whole in mass. This certainly did not accord with the just expectations of my Government, founded upon the declarations of Mr. Cevallos, when he transferred the negotiation to Washington.

But I refrain from dwelling more particularly on this matter, and pass to that part of your excellency's note which contains a proposal for arranging our differences here.

With a view to the most speedy termination of these differences, you propose that, without suspending or delaying the instructions which are to be sent to Mr. Onis, we now enter upon the negotiation; and you ask me whether I feel authorized to confer with you on the matter, and to conclude an arrangement. Instructed of the invariable desire of the President to regulate by treaty all the grounds of difference which have unhappily so long subsisted between the two countries, and to establish their relations of peace on the most solid and permanent basis; and being also well persuaded of the sincerity and conciliatory disposition which dictate this proposal on the part of your excellency, it is my duty to promote the object of it as far as may be in my power; and I do not hesitate to explain myself to you on this head with the utmost frankness.

The powers and instructions which I received from my Government, as announced in my letter to Mr. Cevallos of August 26, 1816, have not been revoked; but your excellency understands perfectly well the situation in which I am placed as regards these, by the refusal of your predecessor to treat here, and by the powers which he sent to Mr. Onis. You will clearly perceive that I cannot do or consent to any act which may have the least tendency to retard, in the smallest degree, the arrangement so much desired; consequently, that I ought to avoid entering into regular discussions on the several subjects of my note of August 26th—discussions which must needs occupy a great deal of time, and consequently delay the departure of Mr. Noeli; for I presume that it cannot be within your plan that he should depart pending such discussions, and thus produce all the difficulties, embarrassments, and interminable delays of a double negotiation.

Connected with this is another consideration of major importance. Your excellency is fully aware that the transfer of negotiations from Madrid to Washington, in the last year, had the appearance of an unnecessary procrastination, and that the subsequent discovery of the insufficiency of Mr. Onís's instructions might even seem to justify the reproach of its being a studied one. Now, the retransfer of the negotiations to Madrid, unless we are perfectly certain that they will terminate favorably, will, as far as it may tend to create further delay, necessarily have the same effect in augmented force. I am confident that such a course is neither in the policy nor character of your excellency; it is necessary, however, for me to pronounce myself explicitly on these points.

The Secretary of State of the United States, in his letter to Mr. Onís of January 25th, has observed that Mr. Onís "had agreed with him that any further discussion of subjects which had been so often discussed and completely exhausted would be useless, since it could not be presumed that any change of opinion on any point could take place on either side. Each party understands its rights, and has doubtless made up its mind as to the conditions which it is willing to adopt."

Within the rule, therefore, which this paragraph points to, I am disposed to act. I presume your excellency's plan to be substantially the same, and your proposal to have been suggested by and founded on that which you understand the Secretary of State of the United States to have made to Mr. Onís; indeed, you have expressed yourself on both of them in nearly the same terms.

Thus, when His Majesty's Cabinet shall have determined on the instructions to be given to Mr. Onís, it will have determined on the conditions on which the treaty shall be made; then, if your excellency will offer to me the basis of an adjustment, I will say instantly whether I can or cannot accede to it, or will propose to you such modifications of it as my instructions may require, and His Majesty's Government may find to be admissible.

In these transactions we shall, as your excellency has well observed, take for our guide considerations of reciprocal convenience, each of us keeping in view the rights of our respective Governments. These being perfectly understood by both of us, and no discussion being necessary to fix our knowledge of them, we shall avoid reproducing the motives of disagreement to which you allude; and by this knowledge we shall also regulate the concessions which either may be disposed to make.

Thus we may terminate instantly, and in perfect harmony, all causes of present complaint and all grounds of future misunderstanding, and, in a manner satisfactory to both Governments, lay a secure foundation for those friendly relations which they are equally desirous to maintain. I renew to your excellency, &c.

Mr. Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, July 27, 1817.

SIR: I have received your esteemed note of the 19th instant, in which you are pleased to reply to mine of the 16th; and I observe by it that we are animated with equal sentiments and desires to see the different questions pending between our two Governments satisfactorily and honorably terminated. With these dispositions on either side, it will not be difficult for us to arrive at the desired arrangement, provided it is accompanied with a due impartiality of judgment on the matter produced by each of us in support of his rights and pretensions.

I allow that a prolix discussion on the points which have been heretofore agitated may be dispensed with, although subsequent circumstances have not failed considerably to change the state of the question; but I cannot persuade myself that it will be the shortest or the easiest method to present on either side a project of an arrangement of the whole, without a previous examination or conference, in which at least the points in question, and the actual state of them, should be ascertained and settled, and those on which we agree and those on which we disagree should be determined on, and a summary view given of the reasons and grounds of our diversity of opinion. This knowledge is the only rule by which we, our Governments, and the world, can determine upon the propriety or impropriety of the conditions of settlement which may be proposed to you, or of those which, on your part, you may judge proper to propose to me, if you do not conform to those offered by me.

This, I believe, was your mode of thinking, and appears also to have been the orders and instructions of your Government, when, in your note of the 26th August last, you were pleased to say to my predecessor, "I am specially instructed to discuss and to settle with your excellency all the ancient causes of misunderstanding, as well as the questions growing out of recent occurrences, which are of a character unfavorable to the object in view;" and in another part you add: "A frank exposition of all the grounds of complaint is at once the most just and most judicious course; for, to suppress or to smother any of them, in condescension to temporary considerations, is but to leave the seeds of future discord, and to substitute palliatives and expedients for satisfactory and solid arrangements."

Though the urgent occupations which at that time engaged the attention of the ministry did not allow of its entering with you into the desired discussion, yet His Majesty did not disapprove of the method and idea proposed by you; on the contrary, the very same served as a rule for the conduct prescribed to Don Luis de Onís, the seat of negotiation only being changed; that is, instead of its being carried on at Madrid between you and the Secretary of State of His Majesty, it was to be carried on at Washington between the Secretary of State there and the Minister of the King.

Don Luis de Onís, to whom was prescribed the said conduct adequate to your proposition, could not but notice the considerable difference between what he had been thus advised of, and the manifestation which was forthwith made to him by that Government, of its considering any discussion to be useless, since it was not to be presumed that either party would change its opinion; and this circumstance has been one of the motives which has obliged him to solicit instructions more suited to the present dispositions manifested by that Government, as I had the honor to state to you in my note of the 16th instant.

I give due weight to what you are pleased to indicate to me relative to your situation after the occurrences which have intervened; but I also think that, animated with the same zeal for the true interest of our Governments, we may in a short time do much, and, without considerably retarding the departure of Don Luis Noeli, we may arrive at some conclusive result, or at least facilitate the conclusion of the negotiation.

In my opinion, the object would be promoted by a short discussion, in which we shall establish the points of controversy, and the respective grounds of them, before presenting any plan of arrangement; but if you think differently, I have no objection to make out a project of arrangement, though it will carry with it the inconvenience of not having been preceded by an examination of the solid foundations on which, I believe, I am able to support it; at the same time, the instructions which Don Luis Noeli is to carry to the Minister, Onís, will be preparing; for the intention of His Majesty is, that no means or mode shall be neglected which may produce an arrangement, provided that the conditions of it be compatible with the interest of his vassals and the honor of his Crown. I renew, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

MADRID, July 29, 1817.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday evening your excellency's note of the 27th instant.

Respecting what is contained in my note of the 19th instant, in reply to the proposal which you were pleased to make to me in your note of the 16th instant, you observe, that though a prolix discussion of the several points in question between our two Governments may be avoided, yet that, previous to any project for the arrangement of them being presented, it might be well for us to enter into some examination, and come to some agreement upon each of them. You deem this mode to be necessary for the justification of our proceedings before our respective Governments, and you conclude that it is the one which I had in view in my note to your predecessor of August 26, 1816. You go on to remark, that though the urgent occupations of that Minister at the time prevented his adopting my plan, yet the same was given for a rule of Mr. Onís's conduct in the negotiation then transferred to Washington; and that it was not till Mr. Onís found the Government of the United States indisposed to renew discussions on subjects which had been so completely exhausted, that he thought proper to send home for such further instructions as might enable him to treat in the mode proposed by the Secretary of State.

Your excellency will permit me to remind you that all the principal points put forward in my above-mentioned note to Mr. Cevallos had been most minutely and repeatedly examined and debated, and that one of them had been adjusted by a convention made here in the year 1802, during the ministry and through the agency of Mr. Cevallos himself; that, subsequently, viz: in the year 1805, Mr. Cevallos being still Minister, the United States, with a desire of regulating by treaty all those questions, sent Mr. Monroe (late Secretary of State) a Minister Extraordinary to this Court; and that, in the negotiations which then took place at Aranjuez, all that learning and ingenuity could produce was exhausted in controversy. Little remained then for me but to reproduce the subjects of complaint, and to support them, wherever they might be contested, by the ample materials which had been furnished by those who had gone before me. At the same time a reasonable hope, founded on the assurances of Mr. Onís, was entertained by my Government that the Spanish Cabinet would readily consent to forego all irritating questions; the same sentiment was, therefore, expressed in my communication to Mr. Cevallos, and it had evidently a view to the prompt termination of the negotiation. As to the motives which may have induced Mr. Cevallos to decline negotiation, I am bound to consider as valid those which your excellency has offered. They are not, however, such as he thought proper to allege in his note to me of September 15, 1816. He founds his determination on a passage in Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Onís of June 10th; the very letter in which the Secretary of State, after expressing his regret that Mr. Onís had not power to negotiate, informs him of my appointment for that purpose. How Mr. Cevallos could have construed this into a desire of the President to remove the negotiation to Washington, thus rendering useless the instruction which it was announced had just been given to me, I am wholly at a loss to conjecture; but certain it is that no other plea was offered for the very extraordinary measure then taken than His Majesty's desire to accede to the wishes of the President.

I understand your excellency to intimate that the plan of negotiation proposed by me to Mr. Cevallos having been approved by His Majesty, and given to Mr. Onís as a rule for his conduct, no change of policy or disposition in this Government is to be inferred from its removing the negotiation to Washington—that it was a mere change as to place, which is not important.

On this your excellency must allow me to observe that Mr. Onís himself, after he had received his powers, confessed, in a note of February 10th to the Secretary of State, that he was entirely ignorant of what had passed between Mr. Cevallos and me. If you will revert to the correspondence, you will find abundant proof that Mr. Onís was not placed in the situation which you have supposed.

In my note to Mr. Cevallos of August 26, 1816, I am told that I was "specially instructed to discuss and to settle." In that of September 19th, that I could "in no case be under the necessity of referring to my Government for future instructions," &c. I expressly asked the Minister whether it was His Majesty's intention to place Mr. Onís "in a position equally favorable to the speedy adjustment of our differences." Mr. Cevallos did not pretend that such was his intention; and, in fact, we find by Mr. Onís's correspondence in several places, but most distinctly in his letter of February 21st to the Secretary of State, that he had no instructions whatever. In that of February 10th, he even makes conjectures as to the mode in which they may have miscarried; in that same letter he also makes conjectures as to the motives which his Government may have had for transferring the negotiations to Washington. And thus, sir, it is also made evident that Mr. Onís has sent home for instructions, because he had them not; not because he has made any new discovery as to the views of the American Government with respect to the mode of conducting the negotiations.

Certainly, after all the discussions which had taken place upon all the points in contest between the two countries, it was no extravagant expectation in the Government of the United States that the Spanish Government was prepared for an arrangement, and that no more time was to be lost in reconsidering matters which had been so often considered. Yet, withal, in consenting, in the year 1816, to treat in this way with Mr. Onís himself on the great question of boundaries, the claims of the United States on that point are very particularly insisted on in the Secretary of State's letter to Mr. Onís of June 10th of the same year. I beg leave to call your excellency's attention to that letter. It was after that attempt to settle the point had failed, from the impossibility of coming to an agreement, created by the very extraordinary pretensions set up by Mr. Onís, and after he had declined to enter into any negotiation for the claims of the United States on account of spoliations and the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans, that the Secretary of State wrote to him the letter of January 25th, which your excellency has quoted; and even in that very letter he anew invites Mr. Onís to negotiate on the points mentioned in his preceding letter of January 14th.

Your excellency will see, then, that the American Government has never avoided discussion, when it might tend to any useful purpose, but that it has avoided all controversy which could produce nothing but irritation; and that it declined to continue to agitate these questions with Mr. Onís only when it saw that he had no authority to terminate them by an arrangement.

Had Mr. Cevallos made to me the proposal which your excellency now makes, I had readily accepted of it, and I presume that it might have led to a happy result; but, by the course which that Minister took, I have been left in a situation of peculiar delicacy; and of this I perceive that you are fully aware. It is not in my power to treat these subjects now as I would have treated them at that time; this were to transfer the negotiation to Madrid, the inconveniences of which I have pointed out in my note of the 19th instant. To this purpose my instructions are not competent. It is therefore that, though animated by the same conciliatory dispositions which are manifested by your excellency, and though equally anxious to contribute to the desired result, I have yet felt myself obliged to confine myself to the simple proposal contained in my last note.

You are now occupied in forming instructions to Mr. Onís, which, as you are pleased to explain, are to be calculated to enable that Minister to conclude a treaty with the Government of the United States on principles of reciprocal accommodation, without renewing controversies with which both parties ought to be completely fatigued. That being so, it will be quite easy, as it appears to me, for your excellency to accede to my proposal.

Your instructions render discussions at Washington unnecessary; they cannot then be necessary here; they will contain in effect the terms of a treaty. The same may then be proposed here, with a view to saving of time, and to avoiding the possible delays pointed out in your note of the 16th. You will of course found your instructions on a thorough knowledge of antecedent discussions. I, on my part, am fully informed on the claims of my Government. You are also well acquainted with the extent of those claims, and of the ground on which they repose. I can have nothing new to offer to you on the subject. We bring into our communications a reciprocal spirit of conciliation, and a mutual conviction that the questions in dispute are susceptible of an adjustment which will establish on a solid foundation the friendly relations between the two countries. Your excellency cannot fail to conform to the wishes of your Sovereign, whose daily orders you have the advantage of receiving; and I, on my part, doubt not but that, in accepting an arrangement which shall secure the rights and honor of the United States, I shall meet with the approbation of my Government.

I renew to your excellency assurances, &c.
G. W. ERVING.

Don Jose Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, August 17, 1817.

SIR: In answer to your esteemed note of the 29th ultimo, and to conform with your wishes, I shall proceed to present you in this letter with my ideas as to the plan of an arrangement which may at once terminate in a friendly way, with reciprocal utility, and without leaving seeds of discord for the future, all the questions pending between the two Governments. My desire to please you induces me to make it in this form, although I am persuaded that any method of proceeding is premature which deviates from that indicated in your letter of August 26 of the last year; and that the sure method of arriving at the arrangement desired is, as I had the honor to tell you in my note of the 16th of June last, "to take for our guide the perfect knowledge of the right of each party, modified by considerations of reciprocal utility."

Allow me to observe, first of all, that you are pleased to express in support of the mode of thinking of your Government, as to the points of discussion having been exhausted in the negotiation at Aranjuez in the year 1805, does not appear to me to be altogether well founded; for, since that epoch, so great is the mass of documents and authentic and indisputable proofs, as well French as Spanish, which His Majesty has collected respecting the subjects of that discussion, and particularly relative to the western boundary of Louisiana, that I doubt whether there be a point which is susceptible of more exact and rigorous demonstration than the determination of the dividing line, which has separated (and separates) Louisiana from the province of Texas and the other Spanish possessions in that part of the continent, as I will have the honor to show you in the event of our entering particularly into the examination of this question.

On the other hand, as I have already intimated in my note of the 27th ultimo, and as you have previously acknowledged in yours of the 26th August, the circumstances that have occurred since the year 1805 have considerably altered the state of the question in nearly all the points of controversy.

To be convinced of this, it will suffice to reflect on the augmentation since that period of the claims for indemnity on account of losses, injuries, and harm suffered by the Government and subjects of the two countries in consequence of the excesses committed by individuals of both nations against the law of nations and the existing treaty. You, on your part, in your aforementioned note of the 26th August, indicate some of these, and I will not enter here into the details of those which His Majesty and Spanish subjects have to reclaim on their part, not only because this detail would be now inopportune, but because the claims on both sides are to be subjected to the examination and judgment of the mixed commission which may be established to decide on them.

Besides this, posterior to the year 1805, the extraordinary event has occurred of His Majesty's having been unexpectedly deprived, in the year 1810, during his captivity, of the pacific possession in which he was of that part of West Florida which is between the river Iberville, the lakes Maurepas, Pontchartrain, and Borgne, on the one side, and the river Perdido, on the other. When the indisputable property of His Majesty in the said territory was demonstrated, it was proved that Spain did not acquire it of France in 1763; that she received it of England in 1783 by a solemn treaty; that it was not, and could not be, comprehended in the "retrocession of Louisiana" made to France in the year 1800; that the Government of France "has declared so officially," and in the most solemn manner, as well to Spain as to the United States; that the fifth article of the treaty of 1778 between France and the United States opposes itself expressly to the acquisition by France (though she had attempted it) of said territory from Spain in 1800; that the royal cedula of His Majesty, issued in Barcelona on the 15th October, 1802, for the delivery of Louisiana, (which royal cedula was in the hands of the French Government before the United States thought of acquiring the colony,) did not contemplate the delivery of territory east of the Mississippi other than that of the "island of New Orleans."

To these grounds, which have established, and do establish, in the clearest manner, the property of His Majesty in the said territory, may be added those of his pacific possession without interruption. The delivery of Louisiana took place without the least idea having occurred to the French commissioners, who received it of His Majesty for the purpose of delivering it to the United States, of aspiring to the possession of the territory between the Iberville and the Perdido; Spain continued, in the years following the delivery, exercising over it all her authority, and the United States respected this possession. A certain custom-house regulation of the United States, in the year 1804, which seemed to contain some expressions susceptible of an equivocal meaning as to the rights of His Majesty in the territory of Mobile, was declaimed against on the part of the King, and the United States agreed to give a satisfactory and honorable explanation as to the said expressions. Whatever might be then, in that state of things, the pretension of right which might be formed against it, it did not appear to conform to the principles universally acknowledged to enforce that pretension* by means of acts, and, in truth, it was a painful duty for the faithful Ministers of His Majesty, on his return from his captivity, to explain to him by what means and circumstances he had been deprived of the peaceful possession of the greater part of West Florida without war, or any other stipulation which could authorize, having preceded it.

The King, attributing this extraordinary event to the circumstances (also extraordinary) of the epoch which had intervened, flattered himself that the United States would not defer placing things in the state which they were in at the time he left his dominions, and the invasion of the Peninsula by Bonaparte. The glory, and even the interests of the United States, might equally incline them to this restitution; for a recent and costly experience has made the world see that there are no acquisitions of territory, however extensive, which can compensate the advantages to result from the reputation which those Governments acquire who regulate their operations by principles conservatory of order and justice.

With these ideas, the King directed his Minister at Washington that, before he entered into the discussions which had remained pending, he should solicit the restoration of affairs in the state in which they were at the time of his absenting himself. This preliminary step appeared correspondent to the decorum of His Majesty, and the United States could not fail to acknowledge it to be so; it being very certain that the delicate honor of the American Government would not consent, in a similar case, to enter into other negotiations, finding itself inquired in the pacific possession of even one mile of its acknowledged territory, without first soliciting and obtaining the due restoration.

Notwithstanding this, and that the answer of the Secretary of State of the 19th January, 1816, is far from containing the satisfaction and restoration which Spain had reason to expect, His Majesty, to give unequivocal proofs of his moderation, and of his friendly dispositions towards the United States, without renouncing—as he does in no way renounce, nor will renounce, unless in the case of some compromise—the right of property and possession which he has in the said territory, has judged fit not to insist on his demand for the present, in the hope that this point, though in its nature it ought to be preliminary, may enter into the general arrangement with the others; but your penetration will acknowledge readily that on this essential point, as in others, the state of the question is not what it was in the year 1805, new occurrences of such importance having taken place since that period.

You might not then be surprised that Don Luis de Onís, seeing himself in the necessity of omitting all discussion, as well on the points already discussed in the year 1805 as on the more recent occurrences, and invited to give his judgment on plans of adjustment presented by one or the other party, should believe that the instructions which he previously had were insufficient, and even the intimation (aviso) conformable to the contents of your note of the 26th August, which was remitted to him with the powers; and that in this state he conceived himself without instructions to treat in the mode which, from the commencement, he knew would be agreeable to that Government; for, though you are pleased to say that it was by the note of the Secretary of State of the 25th January that Señor Onís might observe that it was desired to avoid all further discussion, I observe, by the letters which I have from that Minister, that on the 6th January he received the powers of His Majesty, and that on the 10th of the same month he advises that the Secretary of State had already in verbal conference expressed his opinion that discussion was useless, and that he had desired that proposals and plans of arrangement to be made out, which were already making out on the 12th.

But, leaving aside these incidents, which will be settled by the transmission of competent instructions to Señor Onís, I go on to propose to you, as I have offered, the principal conditions of an arrangement which, in my opinion, may terminate with reciprocal satisfaction the pending questions. Although these will be sufficient to explain my mode of thinking, you will probably notice that in some points they are diffuse, where I have thought it necessary to allude to the right from whence proceeds the proposal made; and that in other places they are succinct, where I have thought that details may be omitted for the present which it will be necessary to enter into afterwards, if it be agreed to put in form the transaction, to clothe it with the correspondent authority; in which case we shall draw it out by common consent in terms appropriate to our purpose.

Project of conditions or articles of arrangement.

1st. His Catholic Majesty and the United States, carrying into effect the convention which is pending since the year 1802, oblige themselves to the reciprocal indemnification of the losses, injuries, and prejudices produced to the Government or subjects of either country, in consequence of excesses committed by individuals of either nation against the law of nations or the existing treaty, comprehending in this reciprocal obligation, not only the epoch to which the said convention of 1802 refers, but also indemnities for posterior excesses of the same kind, committed by individuals of either nation, from such epoch till the day in which the present convention shall be settled and signed.

2d. To admit, to qualify, to judge, and definitely to decide on the reclamations of this kind which shall be presented, as well on the part of the Government and vassals of Spain as on the part of the Government and citizens of the United States, a commission of five members shall be created, of which two shall be freely nominated by the Government of the United States, and two in the same manner by the Government of His Catholic Majesty, and the fifth by mutual consent; and in case both Governments cannot agree on the person to be designated for fifth commissioner, one shall be named on each side, and the final election of one of these be decided by lot; but the two persons so named shall have the following qualifications: 1st. They shall be neither Spaniards nor citizens of the United States, either by birth or naturalization. 2d. They shall be, by their profession and actual occupation, judges, such as in maritime and commercial States are accustomed to examine and decide in matters of public law and maritime affairs, whether from France, England, Russia, Austria, or the Low Countries. 3d. The nomination of the person shall be accompanied with a certificate of the Government of the country to which he belongs, by which shall be accredited the opinion there entertained of his integrity and sufficiency, of his quality and actual employment of judge in the said matters, and with a certainty that he may have permission to discharge the duties of the commission in case the lot should fall on him.

In case the American Government shall prefer that the commission be composed of seven persons, then the fifth, sixth, and seventh shall be elected by the same method, and have the same qualifications as are indicated for the fifth in this article.

3d. The substance of the two preceding articles is taken almost literally from the convention drawn up in 1802, and from the same convention may be taken, strictly to the letter, all that is expressed in it respecting the rules which the commission is to observe from the moment of its installation till its dissolution, after the faithful and impartial discharge of its duty.

4th. His Catholic Majesty has no difficulty in consenting, also, that the same commission should decide on the reclamations arising from the losses said to have resulted from the suspension of the deposit at New Orleans, decreed by the Intendant of Louisiana in the year 1802, in the part of his decree which is reputed to be contrary to what is stipulated in the treaty of 1795, provided it is not desired to attribute to said suspension the prejudices produced by false rumors of a suspension in the navigation of the Mississippi, which never existed, and the rumors of an early rupture, which some bad-intentioned persons delighted to propagate at that time, in the territory of the United States; for the bad effects and prejudices resulting from such false rumors can only be attributed to the authors of them.

5th. His Catholic Majesty having received from the Government of France, on different occasions, the official and explicit declaration that the injuries supposed to have been brought on the Government and citizens of the United States by the French corsairs, agents, and tribunals, on the coast of Spain, had been comprehended and settled with all others in a convention made in 1800 between France and the United States, respecting the reclamations of the American Government, it follows, as well from this circumstance as from others which were previously manifested, that this point should be excluded altogether from the pending negotiations. But if the Government of the United States still insist in not considering itself satisfied for the said injuries, the natural course and order of the business appears to be, and has always been, that the American Government should apply on it to the Government of France, (to whose advantage, and to that of its subjects, the product of those depredations, if they existed, was converted;) and His Majesty, fulfilling on his part what is provided in this case by the sixth article of the treaty of 1795, obliges himself to employ his efforts, in union with the United States, to reclaim and cause to be restored to the legitimate proprietors the value of the vessels and goods which were taken from them, provided that these reclamations have not been extinguished by the said convention of 1800, as France has assured the Government of Spain in its repeated communications.

6th. His Catholic Majesty, master of Florida, East or West, in all the extension in which he received them from England by the treaty of 1783, and which they had in possession of Great Britain before said treaty, will be willing, for his part, to cede them with the same extension to the United States of America, in full property and perpetual sovereignty, provided that the United States are equally disposed, on their part, to cede in the same form to His Catholic Majesty that part of Louisiana which is situated to the west of the Mississippi, and is the territory which lies between said river and the well-known limit which now separates, and has separated Louisiana, when France possessed it before 1764, and even before the death of the King of Spain, Charles II., from the Spanish province called Texas; so that, after these reciprocal cessions are verified, the course of the river Mississippi, from its source to where it discharges into the sea, will be the only limit of the dominions of His Catholic Majesty, and those of the United States; and though the King could wish that, in the most southern part of said river, where it opens different branches or channels before discharging itself into the sea, the separating line might be continued through the principal channel which passes by New Orleans, yet His Majesty desiring, in all that depends on him, to facilitate the arrangement, it may be agreed and stipulated that the dividing line in the part where the Mississippi separates itself and flows into different channels shall be established towards the western part, placing it in the middle of the arm, or channel, called La Fourche, to where it discharges itself into the sea; all the delta, or ground of alluvion, situated on the east of said channel La Fourche, remaining in the power of the United States.

7th. As, by the eighth article of the Treaty of Utrecht it is declared that, for the future, all cessions, sales, or alienations of the Spanish territory in America, shall be null and of no value, Spain herself remaining without power to make them, and England obliging herself to aid the Spaniards, that the limits of their dominions in America should be established and maintained as they were before the decease of King Charles II., and as the part of the Floridas situated on the east of the river Perdido was a Spanish possession at the time of the decease of the said King Charles II., and therefore is comprehended in the said eighth article of the Treaty of Utrecht, it is not in the power of his Catholic Majesty to effectuate by himself the cession mentioned in the preceding article, without the previous consent and agreement of the Power or Powers interested in the fulfilment of the said Treaty of Utrecht; for which reason it will be indispensable, in case that the United States shall accede to the proposed arrangement, to solicit and obtain the said consent of the Power or Powers interested, and the derogation on this occasion, and for this sole purpose of the said article of the Treaty of Utrecht, which in all other respects shall hereafter remain in full force.

8th. It shall not be permitted that vessels employed in cruising and committing hostilities against the Spanish Government and vassals, or their commerce, shall be armed or enter armed in the ports of the United States; and the vessels and effects which such armed vessels may take from the vassals of His Majesty, and which may be carried into the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be embargoed and secured by the authorities of the same, and definitively delivered to the Minister or to the Consul of His Majesty who may be at the nearest place, to hold at the disposal of those who may prove that they are the legitimate owners. And for the purpose of preventing and prohibiting clandestine armaments, which may be made in contravention of this stipulation, the United States promise to give the strictest orders to the officers to whom it belongs to watch over and frustrate all attempts of this kind, the United States obliging themselves to detain all suspected vessels, without permitting their departure till the suspicions respecting them shall have been cleared up, or till they have given bonds to the satisfaction of the respective Consuls of His Catholic Majesty, guarantying that they shall not commit such piracies and aggressions against the vassals of His Catholic Majesty, who, on his part, obliges himself to do the same in the ports of Spain with respect to the United States.

9th. It being notorious that divers American citizens, in violation of the law of nations, and of the stipulations of the existing treaty, in its articles 9, 12, 14, and 16, have occupied themselves for some time past in hostilities against the Spanish commerce and subjects, under the pretext and cover of certain unknown flags; and that others, with equal irregularity, have carried and supplied arms, ammunition, and other aid to the rebels of some Spanish ultramarine provinces which are in a state of insurrection; several of the said citizens having gone to the extent of taking arms, and acting openly in support of said insurrection, His Catholic Majesty does not doubt but that the Government of the United States, disapproving of the conduct of the said individuals, and animated by a spirit of justice, and of a religious observance of the law of nations and of the treaty, will oblige itself, by an article of the present arrangement, to promulgate, and cause to be executed, decrees and orders, which may restrain and prevent such excesses in future; in which way, also, may be avoided the reclamations consequent on the injuries occasioned by the same excesses. And His Catholic Majesty, in just reciprocity, will oblige himself, on his part, to repress and prevent, in the same form, whatever excesses of the same or a similar nature his vassals may be guilty of, to the prejudice of the Government and citizens of the United States, or of their commerce.

The preceding articles or conditions fulfil, in my opinion, the proposed object, and embrace whatever is essential to terminate honorably, and with reciprocal utility, the pending discussions; for though there are some points of secondary and subaltern importance which ought also to be comprehended in the arrangement, it does not appear to be opportune to enter into them till we are agreed on the most essential articles; and these, if the case should happen to clothe them with due authority, we will draw out by common consent, explaining them with the clearness, exactness, and precision which is requisite in a transaction so important in itself and in its consequences.

By this communication which, pursuant to your suggestion, I have the honor to make you as to the ideas of the Government of Spain, on an arrangement or settlement of all the pending points, you will acknowledge the disposition of His Majesty to terminate, in a manner satisfactory and reciprocally useful, the differences which have arisen; but if the American Government, or you, who have been pleased to manifest to me that you are instructed in its intentions, should not find, in this project, the reciprocal utility which Spain has believed to exist in it; in this case the King, constant to give proofs of the rectitude of his intentions, proposes, in the same spirit, another just, honorable, and conciliatory method, which the good faith of the American Government cannot decline; for it is that which is commonly adopted by civilized nations when they proceed with a sincere intention to settle, in a friendly and impartial mode, their differences. This mode, by which will be also avoided the inconvenience pointed out by the American Secretary of State to the Minister, Onís, arising from the difficulty of overcoming, in discussions, the attachment and tenacity of each party to its opinions, and to the pretensions which they have already advanced, is no other than to submit, on both sides, the points in question, and the grounds of them, to the examination and impartial judgment of one or more Powers friendly to the United States and to Spain, chosen by common consent, and who shall definitively decide upon the justice and extent of the pretensions of both Governments; to which end there shall be sent by the United States and by Spain commissioners to inform the Power or Powers chosen for arbitrators of their respective rights, each engaging in advance to abide by their decisions; or otherwise that, by common consent, they (two parties) should solicit the mediation of one, two, or more Powers, friendly to both, that by means of this impartial intervention we may arrive at the desired arrangement. The United States cannot but acknowledge the propriety of this proposal, which, besides that it carries with it the character of good faith, is substantially the same which, in a similar case, the American Government has adopted for the deciding of points of the same nature, in the articles 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the treaty concluded at Ghent on the 24th December, 1814, between the United States and Great Britain.

I persuade myself that in all I have said you will see, and your Government will also see, evident proofs of the real desires which animate His Majesty to live in harmony with the United States, establishing for the future an order of things of a nature to avoid the easy reproduction of motives of disagreement. I hope that you also, in the disagreeable event of not considering yourself to be sufficiently authorized to conclude with me here the desired arrangement in the sense of the articles stated, or to agree to the decision by arbitration, or to the mediation which I have proposed, in reporting to the Government of the United States this communication, will think fit to support it with the observations which your known earnestness to promote the harmony and prosperity of both countries will dictate, so that Don Luis De Onís, to whom will be sent instructions analogous to the principles of justice and mutual convenience which I have laid down in this letter, may find greater facilities for arriving at the desired object, and thus we may both see established, upon solid and permanent ground, harmony between two nations which have the greatest interest in preserving it, and none in leaving seeds of discord, produced rather by unfortunate circumstances than by the intention of their respective Governments.

I cannot conclude this letter without manifesting to you another signal proof of the friendly dispositions of His Majesty towards the United States; and that is, that the re-establishment of the statu quo of 1792, and the annulment of various innovations and political changes, introduced by the abhorred tyrant of France in the epoch of his fatal domination, having been acknowledged by all the Powers as a base to secure the peace of the world; and, on the other hand, it being evident the artifice with which he (Napoleon) forced from Spain Louisiana, under pretext of an illusory exchange, as also the promise which he made, and soon after broke, not to alienate that colony; the King, my master, notwithstanding these considerations, and that neither the kingdom of Etruria, nor any equivalent for Louisiana, dismembered from his dominions, has been secured to him, or for the other sacrifices made at the same time, has abstained from making any demand on this point, on the ground of the statu quo of 1792; on the contrary, is disposed, if the United States desire it, to renew, by an express article of the convention, in which the pending questions shall be settled, the past stipulations respecting Louisiana, correcting by this means whatever defect they might have been affected with in their origin.

I profit of this occasion to renew to you, &c.
JOSE PIZARRO.

Mr. Erring to Don Jose Pizarro.

MADRID, August 19, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 17th instant, in which you are pleased to communicate to me the outline of such a plan of adjustment of the several questions existing between the two Governments as you believe to be well calculated to effectuate our common object of restoring a perfect good understanding, and laying a foundation for perfect harmony.

As, in my notes of 19th and 29th July, I have fully explained to you the absolute impossibility in which I have been placed, by the transfer of the negotiations to Washington, of entering with you into regular discussions, and as your excellency has well understood, and had due consideration for the motives which have determined the course that I have observed in this respect, I might with propriety now confine myself to the merely assuring you that I am not able to accede to the basis which you have proposed, and, taking that basis as the result of the deliberations of His Catholic Majesty's cabinet, to the expression of my very sincere regret that it differs so widely from what would be reasonable in the view of my Government, I might add, that even if I were authorized anew to engage in these discussions, your excellency's project would scarcely offer me a hope of coming to such an arrangement as might satisfy the just expectations of the United States; for, as appears to me, in its leading features, it does but formalize the views more loosely exposed by Mr. Onís, on which the opinion of my Government has been already pronounced.

Nevertheless, I am induced, by the manner in which your excellency has stated the pretensions of Spain as well as by respect for your personal character, to make a few remarks upon the chief articles of your project, that you may thus be the more completely convinced that it is out of my power to adopt it, and in the hope that your dispositions to conciliation may induce you to model your instructions to Mr. Onís on a plan altogether different.

And, first, permit me to correct a misapprehension in which your excellency seems to have fallen with regard to my note of August 26, 1816, to your predecessor. You think that I have therein acknowledged that occurrences which have passed since the negotiations at Aranjuez, in the year 1805, have considerably altered the state of the question on nearly all the points of controversy. In the commencement of that note, after announcing the disposition of the President to enter into arrangements which should lay the foundation for a lasting good intelligence between the two countries, I informed Mr. Cevallos that I was "specially instructed to discuss and to settle" all causes of misunderstanding, as well of ancient as of recent date. I then proceeded to state the principal points on which I was so authorized to negotiate, and, finally, more concisely to enumerate those before alluded to as of recent date; it was my intention to show that the causes of complaint had multiplied and been aggravated, but not that the state of the question on the points which had been previously discussed at Aranjuez had been thereby altered; nor can I now see, in the circumstances particularized by your excellency as grounds of complaint on the part of Spain, any reason for assent to such an opinion. The claims of Spanish subjects on the American Government, and of the Spanish Government, for excesses committed by individual citizens, which you advert to as posterior to the convention of 1802, I was wholly unaware of. Your excellency will thus perceive that it were impossible for me to accept of your first article, providing for a species of claims never before brought into view, and for others of a nature entirely novel; hence I may abstain from any remark on the new and difficult mode of forming a commission by the second article. But much less could I pretend to engage my Government, as proposed by your fifth article, to relinquish its claim on Spain for indemnities on account of French spoliation within her jurisdiction—a claim in its nature so indisputable—and, in lieu of it, resort to the hopeless resource of asking compensation from the French Government, which, as you state, has declared that same claim to have been already satisfied.

With respect to the very important question of limits, your excellency observes that, since the discussion at Aranjuez, this Government has accumulated documents, as well French as Spanish, more especially respecting the western boundary of Louisiana, which render that line susceptible of the most exact and rigorous demonstration. Your excellency has not defined exactly the line so made out, nor can I pretend to have an opinion respecting these new proofs, which I have not seen; but I ought to presume that they have been long since communicated to His Majesty's Minister in America, and that he has derived all the utility from them which they are capable of affording; nevertheless, I have not observed the effect of them in the various communications of that Minister to the Secretary of State of the United States, wherein the question of boundaries is discussed or touched on; and your excellency must have seen, in the Secretary of State's letter to Mr. Onís of June 10, 1816, to which, in my note of 29th July, I took the liberty of requesting your particular attention, that the claims of the United States as to the western boundary are not only reasserted in such a way as to show that they have not been affected by any new evidence which has been produced, but that, in the same letter, to avoid the useless repetition of reasoning which had not been shaken, express reference is made to the notes of March 8th and April 20th, passed at Aranjuez in the year 1804. Your excellency will perceive, also, by the Secretary of State's letter to Mr. Onís of January 14th of this year, that, even down to that date, no change of opinion had been effected by whatever, either in conversation or by writing, Mr. Onís had been able to advance in favor of the pretensions of Spain on either boundary; on the contrary, that then the discussion was closed, from the utter impossibility of coming to an agreement on the subject.

Hence your excellency will see how little in my power it can be to accede to your sixth article, founded on the supposition that the United States own but a comparatively small territory on the western bank of the Mississippi, but which, in fact, requires a cession of that vast extent which lies between the Rio Bravo and the Mississippi, in exchange for what His Majesty owns of the Floridas; and how still less possible it were for me to accept of that article, embarrassed with the conditions which your excellency would annex to it by the seventh, upon a plea which I never before heard of, and cannot now comprehend; for it appears to me that the reference which you would make is perfectly gratuitous. Your excellency speaks, I suppose, of that Treaty of Utrecht which was concluded July 13, 1713. I understand that the sole object of the eighth article of that treaty was to place the commercial relations between Spain and Great Britain on the same footing which they had in the time of His Catholic Majesty Charles II. The more effectually to secure to Great Britain the advantages which she was to derive from that state of things, every extension of the French commerce in the Spanish American colonies is prohibited; and, consequently, any transfer of territory directly to her, or through any other Power to her, is also prohibited. The motion for this stipulation is very clearly expressed:

"Y para que la navegacion y comercio á las Indias Occidentales quedasen mas firme y ampliamente aseguradas."

These are words of the treaty, and determine the construction which is to be given to the stipulation. Consequent on this, and in pursuance of the same object, was the obligation which England entered into to solicit and aid ("solicitar y clara ayuda") with a view to restore the state of these possessions to what it was in the time of Charles II. If, perchance, they had undergone any dismemberment since that period, her obligation does not go further.

"Si acaso se hallare que en algun modo, y por algun pretexto, hubieren padecido alguna desmembracion y quiebra despues la muerte de dicho Rey Catolico Carlos Segundo."

Thus the purpose of this eighth article was nothing more than to place the commerce of the colonies, in as far as Great Britain and France were concerned, upon its former footing, and the territorial possession in the state it was left in by Charles II.; the obligation of Great Britain on this latter point ceased, of course, as soon as the object of it was attained.

With respect to the eighth and ninth articles of your excellency's project, I will only observe that no stipulations can be necessary. The United States have done, and continue to do, all that their neutral position and good faith can require; and where the existing laws of the country have been insufficient, there new provisions have been enacted, as you have seen by the law of Congress of March 3d, (called "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States,") which I have had the honor to communicate to you.

As to the alternative which your excellency proposes, on the supposition that your plan may not be acceded to, of referring our differences to the arbitration of other Governments, it is certainly unnecessary for me to assure you that I have no powers or instructions which can authorize my speaking on the matter.

Having, as I trust, now said enough to convince your excellency that your proposals are wholly inadmissible, I refrain from a variety of other observations which your letter has naturally suggested, desiring not to agitate questions which are only fit for discussion where there is a possibility of eliciting from it the grounds of accord.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my distinguished consideration.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Don JOSE PIZARRO.

Don Jose Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, August 31, 1817.

SIR: At the same time that I received your esteemed note of the 19th of this month, I received your private note of the 23d. By the first, I have seen with pain that you not only do not think that you are authorized, since the transfer of the negotiation to Washington, to enter into a methodical discussion of the questions depending between our Governments, but you do not deem admissible by you the project of arrangement which, to comply with your desire, I presented in my note of the 17th; and, finally, that you can say nothing as to the arbitration or mediation which I have at the same time proposed as the most sure means of terminating, in an honorable and conciliatory mode, the existing differences. In my opinion, it were easy to combat and to dissipate the objections which you are pleased to make to my said proposals; but, in the actual state of the business, it has appeared to me more proper to hasten the departure of Don Luis Noeli, with suitable instructions for the Minister of His Majesty in the United States, founded on the knowledge of the respective rights, in considerations of reciprocal utility, and in the desire of an arrangement by honorable, impartial, and conciliatory means. His Majesty hopes that the Government of the United States will do justice to his sentiments, and will be convinced of the rectitude of his intentions. As in your private note you are pleased to express a desire to know the exact day of departure of Don Luis Noeli, I ought to tell you that he will depart within four days, calculating from to-morrow, and that he will take charge of whatever commission you may put under his care, and execute it with the same punctuality as mine.

I profit of this opportunity to renew to you, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Don Luis de Onís to the Secretary of State.

DECEMBER 6, 1817.

SIR: The Message of the President embraces two particular points in the paragraph in which he announces the actual state of the political relations between Spain and the United States, of which I wish to have a precise and exact knowledge, to reconcile their true meaning with the sincerity and purity of the sentiments of which the American Government makes profession, in conformity with those which animate His Catholic Majesty, when he anxiously seeks all possible means of settling the differences pending between the two nations, and of strengthening his friendship and good understanding with the United States on a basis which, being confirmed by the most generous principles of good faith and mutual justice, may be lasting and unalterable, without leaving the seeds of discontent, or ground for fresh differences in future.

The two points I speak of are, first, what relates to Amelia Island; and, secondly, what concerns Galveston.

The President announces, in respect to the first, that this island having been taken possession of by a party of people who belong to no country, or, if they have belonged to any, they have, by their conduct, forfeited all right of public consideration or toleration, they having established in the said island a place of refuge, scandalous by its piracies, and seriously prejudicial, by a contraband trade, to the United States, chiefly in what regards the clandestine introduction of negroes into the territories of the Union, and the carrying off or flight of others from the same country, his excellency has, therefore, determined to put a stop to this evil, and had given orders accordingly.

It is my duty to remind you, sir, that the expedition which took possession of Amelia Island was formed and armed at Charleston and Savannah, under the command of the adventurer, Sir Gregor McGregor, and wholly composed of citizens of this Republic, in violation of the laws of the United States, the law of nations, and the existing treaty between Spain and the said States. I denounced this expedition to you at the time, and invoked the efficacious authority of the Federal Government to prevent it, and punish the offenders. The expedition proceeded, notwithstanding, from the limits and ports of the Union, to invade that island, and there committed the excesses on which the President touches. After McGregor had left Amelia Island, the district court of South Carolina issued a bench writ to apprehend him wherever he might be found within the American territories. This writ could not certainly be issued without a legal evidence of the offence, nor could the offence be more enormous or more notorious in the face of the whole Union. It results from this, that there could be no just ground of converting into an act of hostility, or of public detriment to Spain, the evils which have flowed from the toleration of similar armaments in the bosom of this Union—armaments which had for their object the invasion and plunder of the possessions of a friendly Power.

I therefore request you, sir, to be pleased to inform me of the measures the President may have taken on this point, and of his intentions in relation to it, in order that, by informing the authorities of the King in East Florida thereof, those discontents may be avoided to which an erroneous conception may give rise, and all unfortunate impressions dissipated, which might disturb the lively and sincere desire of conciliation and perfect harmony which actuates His Catholic Majesty.

On the second point, relating to Galveston, the President announces that, in that place, which it is contended falls within the limits of the United States in consequence of the acquisition of Louisiana, a number of vagrant persons had before established themselves, and committed acts of piracy very prejudicial to the trade of the United States; and that, therefore, his excellency had also taken measures to correct those abuses.

There are two things which I have to remark on this point. The first is, that the place of Galveston has not been, nor ever could be, within the limits of Louisiana, because at no time did it make a part of it. It has constantly belonged to the dominions of the Crown of Spain as a territory absolutely unconnected with and distinct from Louisiana, and, as such, ought to be maintained and respected, until the United States produce documents which establish their rights, and annul the titles, until now undisputed, of property and possession on the part of Spain, from the earliest times of its discovery and conquest unto the present; and this will be determined, as there may be occasion for it, and may be just, at the time of amicably arranging the question of boundaries between the two nations, as His Catholic Majesty sincerely and earnestly desires, and as I have the hope to verify in a short time, in his royal name, by means of the negotiation which we have established.

The second thing which I have to recall to you is, that the King's troops drove off from Matagorda the vagabond freebooters who had taken possession of that point; in consequence of which the same adventurers were forced to evacuate Galveston, where they had also established themselves, so that neither of these places was afterwards attacked or infested by them or any other banditti. Moreover, if, by the occupation of Galveston at that time, the United States have sustained injuries, it is notorious that Spain has suffered much greater by the facility afforded to the pirates in capturing Spanish vessels, carrying them into that place, and there selling them to the citizens of this Union; that, from this magazine of plunder, they conveyed the Spanish property to New Orleans and other parts of the United States in American vessels, as is well known to you, sir, and to all the world. In any event, when the injuries reciprocally caused to American citizens by the Government or subjects of Spain, or to the latter by the Government or citizens of the United States, are compared or estimated, such an indemnification will be stipulated as is agreeable to justice and good faith.

These remarks, and others equally obvious, cannot fail to convince you, as I am sure they will convince the whole world that there was not the smallest motive of proceeding to acts of violence on either of the two points which form the subject of this note, and on which the President has touched in his Message. I hope that the intentions of his excellency will not differ from this opinion; and, as well to avoid the disagreeable consequences which might arise from a misunderstanding, as to communicate to the King, my master, the true state of things, I have to request of you, sir, as I now do, a precise and satisfactory explanation on the above-mentioned two points, namely, of the measures taken by the President in relation to them, and of his intentions upon the subject. I flatter myself that you will have the goodness to give me the said explanation as speedily as the case requires; and, in the meantime, allow me to renew the assurances of my high consideration and respect.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The same to the same.

DECEMBER 10, 1817.

SIR: Although I have but just arrived at the Federal city, as you know, I would not have lost an instant, after assembling the principal papers and documents relating to the differences pending between His Catholic Majesty's Government and that of the United States, in resuming and continuing with you, to definitive conclusion, the negotiation which, by fortuitous causes, was suspended in the beginning of the present year, if I had not hoped to give you time for being so far disengaged as to be able to devote to these important concerns all the attention they require. But I ought no longer to defer, on my part, the necessary steps to open communications of such high interest, and consequently to proceed with you to the settlement and amicable arrangement of all the points in dispute between the two Governments.

You will doubtless have been convinced of the impossibility in which I was placed of commencing this negotiation last Winter, by reason of my not being furnished with instructions suitable to the new character which ulterior circumstances had given to it, and my not having then received from my Government such as extended to this case. I despatched the secretary of this legation to Madrid to lay this deficiency before my Sovereign, and the difficulty under which it placed me of entering into a negotiation which might effectually restore the most perfect harmony between the two Powers, by putting an end to all disputes by means of a solemn transaction, which, being founded on the principles of mutual justice, and combined in good faith with those of reciprocal utility and convenience, might be completely satisfactory to both Governments and both nations. His Majesty, filled with the greatest concern on seeing that, by this unexpected accident, the negotiation was delayed, notwithstanding his most sincere and decided wishes to conclude it, and strengthen his friendship and good understanding with the United States, as he had manifested from the moment of his restoration to the throne, gave immediate orders that the necessary instructions should be communicated to me for the execution of this sovereign trust in its fullest extent; and to omit no means, on his part, which might accelerate the desired epocha of this arrangement and definitive transaction, he, at the same time, caused to be proposed, by his principal Secretary of State, to the Minister of the United States at Madrid, a project for the said transaction; but it not having been admitted by that Minister, who said that he was not authorized to resume and terminate in Spain the negotiation already transferred to Washington, and committed to me, the aforesaid secretary of legation returned without loss of time, and brought me the suitable instructions, accompanied with the positive orders of His Majesty that I should omit no means, as far as might be compatible with justice and the honor of his august character, to settle and terminate amicably all pending differences, and generously to satisfy the United States in everything which might depend on the free will of His Majesty.

Such are the dispositions of the King, my master, and such the orders which he has communicated to me, anxious as he is to adjust all differences with the United States, and give them solemn proofs of his high esteem and sincere friendship.

I am ready, therefore, to resume the negotiation, and to pursue it with you in all the points embraced by it, until its final termination; and I shall be very happy if, in doing so, I can satisfy all the desires and just hopes of the United States.

In consequence, I request, sir, that you would be pleased to inform me when you are ready to enter into this important negotiation, and when it will be agreeable to you that we commence the preliminary conferences; or, in case you should consider them unnecessary, that we discuss the means of agreeing on and fixing the most simple, expeditious, and suitable mode of proceeding, with all possible despatch, to the settlement and final adjustment of all the points in dispute.

I await your answer to this note, animated by the most lively desire and the most flattering hopes of terminating all disagreements and contents between two nations which, by their mutual interests and the generosity of their sentiments, have always lived in perfect union and friendship, and ought to cement them more and more for their common happiness.

In the meanwhile, I renew to you my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 16, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 10th instant, and shall be happy to receive you at the office of this Department the day after to-morrow, at one o'clock, to confer with you upon the subject of it. I am instructed by the President, on this occasion, to assure you of the satisfaction with which he has learned that you are furnished with instructions from your Government adequate to the adjustment of all the differences between the two countries, and of the earnestness of his desire that the negotiation may terminate in an arrangement mutually satisfactory. I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1817.

SIR: After I had informed you in my note of the 10th of this month, and confirmed the same in our conference on the 19th, of the frank and friendly dispositions of His Catholic Majesty's Government towards that of the United States, of his sincere desire to settle and terminate the differences pending between the two Governments in a manner just and satisfactory to both, and the positive orders I had received, with suitable instructions to that effect, I also acquainted you that the King, my master, being disposed to oblige the United States in whatever might be compatible with the rights and honor of the monarchy, and the dignity becoming his august character, would condescend to cede the two Floridas to this Republic, in consideration of an exchange or equivalent which might be useful or convenient to Spain. But as this exchange or equivalent must consist of a territory belonging to the United States, and which may offer invariable points, marked by nature, to fix the divisional line between the possessions of the Union and those of the Crown of Spain in a manner never to admit of doubt or controversy hereafter, His Catholic Majesty caused certain proposals for the said exchange or equivalent to be made through his principal Secretary of State to the Minister of the United States at Madrid. They were decidedly declined by him on the ground of their being inadmissible; and I was informed by you that they are so considered by your Government, and that, consequently, it is necessary to have recourse to others which may be admissible in the existing state of things.

Although the proposals made by His Majesty's principal Secretary of State to the Minister of the United States at Madrid were neither absolute nor invariable, it is easy to perceive that they are founded on the perfect conviction of His Majesty as to the irrefragable and notorious rights by virtue of which the Crown of Spain has possessed both Floridas since she acquired them of England, and also the provinces and districts of country possessed by her to the westward of Louisiana, and which have ever been independent of, or absolutely unconnected with and separate from that province, without having ever passed, since their discovery, conquest, and possession, under a foreign dominion. But as the United States, since their acquisition of Louisiana, conceive they have a right to a greater extent of territory, both to the eastward and westward thereof, by setting on foot a dispute respecting the boundaries which separate them from the Spanish possessions, and pretending that they ought to include part of those possessions, it is not strange that the exchange or equivalent proposed for the Floridas did appear inadmissible. It has, therefore, become indispensably necessary to free this question of boundaries from all obscurity, and to adjust and establish the true points which divide, or ought to divide, the Spanish territories from those of this Republic. Unless this inquiry and deliberation be previously made, it is absolutely impossible to point out or judge of a just equivalent, which would be admissible and satisfactory to the two contracting parties, inasmuch as the requisite basis of a cession and its equivalent is wanting; this basis, as is obvious, must be laid in the valuation of the territory specified in the contract, which valuation must be preceded by establishing the territory belonging to Spain, and also that belonging to the United States.

You cannot, therefore, but agree with me, sir, that it is absolutely necessary we should first settle the principal points relative to the question of boundaries, before we proceed to form and offer proposals for the cession of the Floridas, and for an equivalent to their value or estimation, or for the general and definitive settlement of all pending differences. Although this matter has already been the subject of negotiation at Aranjuez, it cannot be said that the discussion should be considered as terminated or exhausted, or that the American Government having then stated its positions and opinions on the subject, it will not depart from them, although the opinions His Catholic Majesty sustains be different. It is unquestionable that, in the discussion entered into at Aranjuez, and early interrupted, not a single point or ground was touched on, on the part of the United States, that could serve as a support to their pretensions; and that, on the part of Spain, there were produced titles, dates, documents, and arguments, incontestably proving, by abundant and irresistible evidence, the rights of the monarchy to the territory in question—rights founded on property and immemorial possession, acknowledged by different Powers, and never disputed by any. This affair is, consequently, not confined to points of opinion, on which each party may respectively maintain that which is best suited to it; it is reduced to unalterable truths and positive and certain facts. I assure you, sir, in the name of my Government, and the King, my master, solemnly promises it on the inviolability of his royal word, that the moment it shall be shown and proved that any of the territories now in dispute do not belong to the Crown of Spain, and, on the contrary, that they do belong to the United States, His Majesty will, with the greatest pleasure, surrender to the disposal of the United States such territory or territories as it shall be made to appear do not belong to the Spanish monarchy, and will, in good faith, acknowledge the right of the United States to the same. His Majesty wishes for nothing that is not his own, or to which his Crown has not a lawful right. I cannot but believe that the views of your Government agree with those I have just stated, and that, consequently, we ought to lose no time in immediately resuming the discussion commenced at Aranjuez as to what relates to its principal points, and, by impartially examining the grounds established by both Governments, and the arguments and proofs which they both have to produce anew in support of their rights or pretensions, acknowledge frankly and with good faith what belongs lawfully to Spain, and what belongs lawfully to the United States. Guided by the certain principles of reason and mutual justice, it will be easy for us, by means of this investigation, to form a settled opinion and come to a just result as to the boundaries which do or ought to separate Louisiana from the Spanish possessions, and thus terminate this dispute. That which is connected with the question of losses and injuries is still more simple and easy to arrange, as you admitted when we conversed on that point in our late conference; and it will, therefore, prove no obstacle to our agreeing on the cession desired by the United States, and proceeding to it by means of a final settlement of all pending differences, which may, at the same time, embrace whatever may be stipulated by this particular agreement.

You may perceive, sir, that the mode I propose is the most simple, just, and proper for accomplishing the negotiation to be entered upon, and is that which was adopted by Mr. Erving, the Minister of the United States, in his note of the 26th of August, 1816, in which he informed His Majesty's Government that he was ready to enter into a full and frank discussion of all the points in dispute, and pledged himself thereto. As nothing further has since been done on the part of Spain than to transfer the negotiation to Washington, the same reasons subsist which then dictated the incontestable propriety and necessity of resuming the discussion; reasons of which you are doubtless fully convinced, as they are not to be combatted by any explanations when examined with good faith, because they are self-evident, and identified with the soundest principles of justice.

As, in consideration of these reasons and principles, I hope you will have no objection to agree to a succinct examination of the question of boundaries, and to a rational and fair inquiry into the titles and grounds on which each Government rests its rights and pretensions, the natural order seems to require that we should begin this examination and inquiry with what relates to the eastern boundaries of Louisiana; that, after establishing them as they ought to be, we may proceed to examine and establish, in like manner, those which regard the western; it being, nevertheless, well understood that neither by this act, nor any one whatever of those which contribute to produce the present negotiation, it shall be inferred that His Catholic Majesty renounces, in any manner, the right he has, or may have, to reclaim against the non-fulfilment of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, concluded between Spain and France in the year 1800, and against the solemn stipulations contained in the additional articles of the same treaty, forming an essential part of the contract between the two nations.

The boundaries of Louisiana, on that side, join those of West Florida, and are so precisely established and fixed by public treaties, that I do not think your Government can still persist in the opinion that Louisiana ought to be extended by this Spanish province to the river Perdido. If, however, the imagination, resorting to specious subtleties and abstractions, carries us back to the period when France formed settlements on the left of the Mississippi, and possessed what are now two distinct provinces, namely, Louisiana and West Florida, still the certain and incontestable fact will follow, that Spain acquired neither of the Floridas from France. That Power, while in possession of those territories, as she was until 1763, might name them, and point out their respective limits as she thought fit. That is quite unimportant to the present question. It is certain that, by the treaty of 1763, France ceded to England all the territory possessed by her to the eastward of the Mississippi, with the exception of the island of Orleans; and it is also certain that England united, as her own, from that year, the same territory to Florida, which, by the same treaty, Spain had ceded to her; and that, having added thereto the district and port of Pensacola, she called it West Florida, by which name, and no other, it has ever since been known. In the war of 1779, Spain conquered the said territory of West Florida from England; and this right of conquest was afterwards secured by a solemn treaty between England and Spain, in September, 1783. It is by this title that West Florida belongs, until the present day, to Spain, in addition to East Florida, which was also ceded by the said treaty. It is evident, then, that Spain neither acquired nor received from France either of the Floridas, but that she acquired them both of England in 1783, classed as two distinct provinces, and universally known by the names of West Florida and East Florida. She has, from that period, possessed them separate and distinct, without having ever confounded either of them with Louisiana, either in whole or in part. They are laid down distinct and separate in the maps, charts, and geographies of all nations, from the year 1763 to the present day. In all the public acts and instruments which speak of them, they appear distinct and separate, as they do in the different treaties in which they are mentioned.

This being the case, how can your Government still maintain its opinion? The United States acquired Louisiana from France such as she had acquired it from Spain by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. In this treaty nothing is stipulated but the retrocession of Louisiana; nor is there a single word in the whole treaty that bears the most distant allusion to West Florida, which is the object to which the dispute is reduced in that quarter. The clauses of the treaty are clear, precise, and conclusive; they fix the sense of the stipulation invariably, and leave no room for vague or specious constructions. The very title given to that treaty by the contracting parties at once pointed out the territory restored by Spain to France in exchange for the kingdom of Etruria. The title says, "Retrocession of Louisiana;" and the word "retrocession" has not, nor ever had, any other signification, in the Spanish or French language, than the act of restoring to an individual, or a nation, that which had before been received from him or from it; so that a different signification cannot be given to this word (adopted by the contracting parties to express the nature of their stipulation) without changing the proper and genuine acceptation, in both languages, of the definite term they have respectively employed, and without substantially changing the intentions which serve as the basis of the contract.

The three clauses by which they afterwards go on to fulfil this convention agree perfectly with the said title, and, by supporting and explaining each other, they fix it in a clear and precise manner. The first clause says: "that His Catholic Majesty restores Louisiana to France, with the same extent it had when possessed by Spain." It is well known that no part of the Floridas, or other Spanish possessions, was then included in Louisiana, or annexed to it. At that time Louisiana was, in the hands of Spain, precisely what it was when ceded by France, in virtue of the treaty of 1764. In the same treaty its eastern boundaries are marked by a line running eastward from Manchac Point, thence following the course of the river Iberville, and dividing the lakes Borgne, Pontchartrain, and Maurepas, and finally terminating at the Gulf of Mexico, without leaving the smallest doubt as to the true points of the frontier. This is the territory which Spain retroceded to France, because it is the only one which she possessed under the name of Louisiana. The second clause agrees with the first, and opportunely declares and fixes its import. It says, "and with the same extent it had when possessed by France"—expressions which necessarily refer to the period of time which intervened between the cession by France to England of the territory possessed by her on the left bank of the Mississippi, and the cession made by the same Power to Spain of Louisiana. As the first of these two cessions took place in the year 1763, and the second in 1764, it is evident that, during that interval, France possessed Louisiana in the manner stated. And with the same extent did she cede it to Spain; nor could she cede it with more, as she then possessed nothing more in that part of the American continent.

If a different meaning be given to this clause, by supposing that the contracting parties allude in it to a former period, when France possessed Louisiana jointly with the territory ceded by her to England in 1763, it would place this clause in absolute contradiction with the title, and with the first clause of the treaty of retrocession; because Louisiana not having, prior to the year 1763, while in the hands of France, the same extent it had when in the hands of Spain at the time of the treaty of 1800, nor the same that it had when ceded by France to Spain in 1764, it follows that the second clause would be absurd and unmeaning if it alluded to a period of time anterior to 1763. It would be absurd and unmeaning, because, having no other object than to explain and determine more circumstantially the first clause, which is the fundamental one of the treaty, and that which governs the other, it would express a thing which could in nowise agree with the stipulations contained in it; since, by giving greater force to the import of the second clause, that which is considered the fundamental basis of the first would be rendered false and erroneous. It would be absolutely contradictory to the express object and intent of the treaty, since Spain not having received Louisiana from France with the extent in which she possessed it prior to the year 1763, but with that which it had when it was ceded in 1764, the retrocession, which, as I have just said, is the express object and intent of the treaty, could not take place. Spain could only cede back to France what she had received from her; nor could she, moreover, add to the retrocession any other particular territory of her dominions, without expressing or mentioning it. Louisiana was ceded back to France such as it was received from her, and as she possessed it in 1800, and had possessed it since she had acquired it. In fact, if Louisiana, while in the hands of Spain, included no part of West Florida, and if Spain had received no part thereof, or of the other Florida, from France, how could she cede it back to France, or cede it without naming it, or saying a single word which could allude to this idea? Let us therefore agree that it is impossible to give an arbitrary construction to the second clause of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, or any other than that which it has, and ought to have, in connexion with the first clause, and with the title and the express object of that instrument. You cannot but be fully convinced, sir, of this truth; and, on proceeding to the examination of the third clause, you will find what I have just stated still more comprehensively and clearly demonstrated. This clause says: "and as it ought to be after the treaties concluded between Spain and other Powers." The only treaties to which this clause could refer were the following:

1. That of 1764, by which France ceded Louisiana to Spain. In this treaty the eastern boundaries of Louisiana are marked by the course of the Mississippi, and next by the river Iberville, the lakes Borgne, Pontchartrain, and Maurepas. It was consequently proper here to recall what was set forth in this treaty. 2. That of 1783 between Spain and England, by which the latter confirmed to Spain the possession and property of West Florida, which she had conquered during the war, and ceded to her East Florida. It is a very fit moment to recall the inviolability of this treaty, since it is evident, from it, that the Floridas are two provinces independent of Louisiana, absolutely unconnected with and distinct from it; and that they came into the possession of Spain by very different titles; in consideration of which, one thing cannot be confounded with another. And the 3d is that of 1795, concluded between Spain and the United States. As in this treaty the frontiers between the United States and the Spanish possessions are described, and the Floridas are named as provinces notoriously unconnected with and distinct from Louisiana; as by it the dismemberment of Natchez, Nogales, &c., was effected; and as it is therein stipulated that the navigation of the Mississippi shall be free to the Americans and Spaniards, and a place granted in favor of the former for their commodities on the banks of the Mississippi, for which purpose New Orleans was designated for the term of three years, it was consequently thought proper to refer to this treaty, and show that it, as well as those of 1764 and 1783, is, and ought to be, in full force and effect.

You will perceive, sir, that the three clauses stipulating the retrocession of Louisiana to France cannot be more conclusive; that they are properly connected with and support each other by declaring and explaining the intentions of the contracting parties, and the precise nature and extent of their contract; so that it is impossible to give another interpretation to any of the said clauses, as that would place them in contradiction with each other, and would, moreover, obscure the evident truth of facts, and involve a monstrous violation of public treaties, without excepting that of 1778 between France and the United States. You doubtless bear in mind, sir, that, by the sixth article of that treaty, France solemnly engages never to acquire West Florida, or any portion of the territory ceded by her to England in 1763. How, then, could she, in 1800, acquire West Florida, or any part of it, even although the Treaty of St. Ildefonso were not specifically and solely confined to the retrocession of Louisiana, such as it was at that time, and as it had been since 1764? The understanding rejects all doubt on points so clear and evident. By the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, France herself only received Louisiana such as it was in the hands of Spain, and as it was after its cession by France. It is well known that it is the act of delivery which completes the contract. France was satisfied with what was delivered to her, and neither claimed nor pretended to anything more. Would the French Government, under Napoleon, have failed to claim this additional territory, if, in that treaty, there had been found a single word of which it could avail itself, or the smallest pretext for making the claim? Certainly not. France knew perfectly well that Louisiana did not comprehend a greater extent of territory, and that all was delivered that belonged to her at the time the contract was made.

The French Government itself, after the dispute arose between the United States and Spain, which is now pending, declared, in two official notes, "that the eastern boundaries of Louisiana are pointed out by the course of the Mississippi, and by the river Iberville, and the lakes Pontchartrain and Maurepas; that Spain has ceded back nothing more to France, nor had the latter a right to pretend to more; and that, having substituted the United States in her rights, they could pretend to nothing more in virtue of the cession or sale made to them of Louisiana."

"The 12th of Fructidor, 12th year.

"The eastern boundaries of Louisiana are pointed out by the course of the Mississippi, and afterwards by the river Iberville, the lakes Pontchartrain and Maurepas. This is the line of demarcation which bounds the territory ceded by Spain to France, by the treaty of the 30th of Ventose, 9th year. Nothing beyond this limit would have been asked for by France; and as she did nothing more than substitute the United States in the rights which she had acquired, they cannot require of Spain a more extensive cession, unless such cession be negotiated and stipulated between them and Spain by some further convention."

"The 5th of Germinal, 13th year.

"This question could not become the subject of a serious discussion between Spain and the United States, except the conditions of the treaties of cession, which have successively transferred Louisiana to France and the Americans, were lost sight of."

"Spain could only cede back to France the territory she had received from her: the rights of France were afterwards transferred to the United States, and they were so only to the same extent."

If, notwithstanding this full and irresistible demonstration, you should be of opinion, sir, that it is still necessary to clear up this point, let us have recourse to France, that she may afford all the explanations that are judged to be necessary or useful, since nothing is more proper than that she and Spain should know to what the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso is reduced, and they alone are competent to clear up any doubts that may have arisen as to the import of the expressions employed in the said treaty. It is unquestionable that it agrees with the principle generally acknowledged, that when a law or treaty offers any doubt, from the obscurity or ambiguity of the words contained in it, the party which made the law or the treaty is the one which should explain the meaning of such words, and remove the doubt which has occurred.

I would now proceed to declare what are, or ought to be, the western boundaries of Louisiana, and what are those which separate, or ought to separate, it from the Spanish possessions, should I not apprehend to make this note too diffuse. Reserving myself, therefore, to discuss this point in a separate note, I now recall to your consideration the chief grounds and arguments on which Spain founds her exclusive right to the whole extent of West Florida, in order that, when we are agreed upon this point, we may proceed to a like examination and deliberation on the western boundaries of Louisiana.

But, although this is the order pointed out by reason and justice in the actual state of the pending differences, nevertheless, that we may judge, upon the most exact information, of the grounds and arguments of each Government, respectively, and, after agreeing on what belongs to Spain, and what belongs to the United States, we may be enabled to lay the basis of a general and final settlement of all differences, if you should think that there can be a more expeditious mode of settling and terminating them, without prejudicing the rights of the Crown of Spain, and on principles of reciprocal utility and convenience, you may communicate your ideas thereon to me, with the certainty that it is the earnest wish of His Catholic Majesty that this negotiation may be amicably terminated, for which purpose he has given me decisive orders and instructions; and I again assure you, sir, that I shall think myself very happy if, in this negotiation, I can satisfy all the just desires and hopes of the United States, for which I shall omit nothing that is in my power, or may be compatible with the rights and honor of His Majesty's Crown.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my respects, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LOUIS DE ONIS.

Don Louis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1818.

SIR: In my note of the 29th of last month, I proved to you, to a degree of moral demonstration which I think to be fully convincing, what are and ought to be the eastern boundaries of Louisiana; and I hope such incontrovertible, decisive reasons cannot fail to bring you fairly to acknowledge that Louisiana neither does nor can include any part of West Florida. As I have not yet received your answer to the said note, it was my intention to wait for it, and not proceed to the examination of the second point of the question of boundaries before we had agreed on and settled what relates to the first, in order to proceed methodically, and not to involve or embarrass the plain and expeditious course of this investigation; but being desirous of not losing an instant in explaining every point relative to so important a matter, I anticipate the examination of the western boundaries of Louisiana, which is the second point of the question, thereby facilitating whatever may claim your attention as to both in their respective order, and enabling you to comprehend the truth at once.

I might contend that the United States, having received the province of Louisiana from France with no greater extent than it had when France received it from Spain in 1800, and when Spain acquired it from France in 1764, that, and no other, ought to be the extent which properly belongs to it, without the necessity of recurring to any other reasons or grounds than those resulting from the Treaty of St. Ildefonso; since Spain having ceded back to France in 1800 only what she had received from her in 1764, being that which France sold to the United States, it is easy to investigate and establish what were, and in all that period continued to be, the proper extent and limits of Louisiana. But I am willing to admit that France did substitute the United States in all the rights or pretensions she had or could have at another period as to what regards the western boundaries of that colony when hers, although nothing to that effect is expressed or insinuated in the treaty between France and the United States, by which the latter acquired it; and that the contrary is evidently to be inferred from the fact that France inserted, word for word, in this treaty the conclusive clauses of that of St. Ildefonso, which speak simply and precisely of the retrocession of Louisiana. I admit (to go on to a more copious and irresistible demonstration) that the United States have succeeded to all the rights which France may have had at another period; and I call your attention, sir, to the following observations before I enter on the examination of the data or grounds on which the United States rest their claims of extending in that quarter the boundaries of Louisiana to the Rio Bravo del Norte.

It is well known that for ages before France thought of forming establishments on the Mississippi, and therefore long before she had made any in Canada, the Crown of Spain possessed the whole territory around the Gulf of Mexico, from the peninsula of Yucatan to the southern cape of Florida. If the eastern part of said gulf, as far as Panuco, the whole of which was then known under the extensive (generico) name of Florida, was not actually peopled by Spaniards, it is notorious and indubitable that it was discovered by them as early as the year 1511, under the expedition of Juan Ponce de Leon; that all the coast, from the present Florida to Panuco, was explored by Francisco de Garay in 1518, and also by Hernando de Soto, and continually by other Spanish commanders until 1561, when it was explored and described by Angel de Villafane and Jorge Ceron; said discoveries and description having been made in pursuance of a royal order issued for that purpose, papers of that description being still extant; and it was confirmed that from those remote periods Spain was established as the mistress and possessor of all that coast and territory, and that she never permitted foreigners to enter the Gulf of Mexico, nor any of the territories lying around it, having repeated the royal orders by which she then enforced the said prohibition, and charged the Spanish Viceroy and Governors with the most strict observance of the same. The right and dominion of the Crown of Spain to the northwest coast of America as high up as the Californias is not less certain and indisputable, the Spaniards having explored it as far as the forty-seventh degree in the expedition under Juan de Fuca in 1592, and in that under the Admiral Fonte to the fifty-fifth degree in 1640.

The dominion of Spain in these vast regions being thus established, and her rights of discovery, conquest, and possession, being never disputed, she could scarcely possess a property founded on more respectable principles, whether of the law of nations, of public law, or any others which serve as a basis to such acquisitions as all the independent Kingdoms and States of the earth consist of.

Confining ourselves at present to the Mexican Gulf and to the Spanish provinces situated to the westward of Louisiana, we shall see in what manner Spain extended her population and founded settlements in different points of the vast territory of which she was the mistress and possessor in this part of the new world. All the country extending from the Rio de las Palmas to the confines of Panuco, in latitude forty-eight degrees, was then included under the name of Florida, and crossed the Mississippi. From the time of the expeditions undertaken to explore it in 1512 by Juan Ponce, in 1525 by Vazquez de Ayllon, in 1528 by Panfilo de Narvaez, and in 1538

by Hernando de Soto, the Spaniards were incessantly engaged in advancing their discoveries and settlements in this extensive country, not only in the time of Luis Moscoso and of Pedro Melendez, between the years 1542 and 1545, but they were constantly so in the time of all their successors. At the time of their first expeditions they landed in the bays of Santa Rosa and Espiritu Santo or St. Bernardo, surveyed the whole coast, and crossed the Mississippi. They penetrated into the countries of Hirrhigua, Moscoso, Umbaracuxi, Aurera, Ocali, Apalache, Altapalia, Cofa, Mobile, Chasquin, Guigate, Uhangue, Guachoya, and others, which it would be tedious to enumerate. The same Hernando de Soto, after having in person surveyed the coast and interior of the country, crossed the Mississippi, and penetrated as far as the Rio Negro, in 1542 died at Guachoya.

No European nation had yet attempted to disturb the Spaniards in their possessions in the new world; none had trod on any point of those territories; and the Spaniards continued extending their establishments, as the only nation which had acquired the possession and the property of that part of the American continent and islands. They gave rise to the new kingdoms of Leon and Santander in the year 1595, and to the province of Coahuila in 1600. They founded that of Texas in 1690, establishing missions, hamlets, and posts, under the name of presidios, such as those of Bahia del Refugio, St. Antonio, Espiritu Santo, St. Juan, Nacogdoches, Ayeses, and San Miguel de los Adaes, a short distance from the Rio Roxo, (Red river,) extending themselves to the banks of that river.

Long before, they had established themselves in New Mexico, where they built the capital of Santa Fe, in thirty-nine degrees north latitude, and opened and worked mines in its neighborhood. From thence they spread themselves wide of the rivers that empty from north and south into the Missouri, communicating and trading with the Indian nations; so that from that time Spain considered all the territory lying to the east and north of New Mexico as far as the Mississippi and Missouri as her property. These dominions and settlements of the Crown of Spain were connected with those which she had on the Gulf of Mexico, that is to say, with those of Florida and the coasts of the province of Texas, which, being on the same gulf, must be acknowledged to belong to Spain, since the whole circumference of the gulf was hers; which property, incontestably acquired, she had constantly maintained among her possessions, not because she occupied it throughout its whole extent, which was impossible, but on the principle generally recognised, that the property of a lake or narrow sea, and that of a country, however extensive, provided no other Power is already established in the interior, is acquired by the occupation of its principal points.

These premises being established, and not to be shaken, as they are all supported by history, ancient monuments, tradition, and irrefragable documents, let us proceed to examine for their origin the grounds on which your Government maintains its pretensions.

As early as the commencement of the seventeenth century, France and England began to form expeditions in imitation of the Spaniards, and to discover points for settlements in that part of America. The French expeditions penetrated into Canada by the river St. Lawrence, and those of the English were directed to different parts of the coast on the Atlantic. Hence originated the basis on which the two nations afterwards founded and extended their respective settlements. I shall now only speak of those made by the French, as they serve as a support to the actual pretensions of the United States. Francis Ribaut, an adventurer of that nation, had already penetrated into Florida with some followers towards the end of the sixteenth century, and built the fort called Charles le Fort; but this rash enterprise on the territory of the Crown of Spain was immediately overthrown and dissipated, the Spanish Governor, Pedro Melendez, having attacked and taken the fort, and made prisoners of Ribaut and all his people. Mention is likewise made by some writers of another Frenchman, called Rene de Laudoniere, who is said to have landed from the squadron of Admiral Coligny, on the coast of Florida, in the year 1564, and built a fort, which he named Carolin, about the spot where Pensacola now stands; but the same writers add that the Spaniards immediately attacked the French, put them to death, and razed the fort or redoubt they had built; others say that it was on that same fort that the Spaniards afterwards built the fortress of St. Augustine; so vague and so uncertain is the information respecting these particular adventurers. The story related of a Recollet friar, called Father Hennipen, is still more ridiculous, who is said to have been made a prisoner by the Indians at the time they were at war with the French of Canada, and taken to the Illinois, whence he was occupied in exploring the country as far as the banks of the river St. Louis or Mississippi, of which he took possession in the name of Louis XIV., and gave it the name of Louisiana, (doubtless in his secret thoughts, and by a mere mental act.) It is added that this friar escaped from the Illinois, and returned to Canada, where he related all he had seen, and afterwards published it in France more circumstantially in a memoir, which he dedicated to the celebrated Colbert. These accounts, and others of a like nature, are contemptible in themselves, even though the facts they relate were authentic, since nothing can be inferred from them that can favor the idea started by those who speak of these transient adventures and incursions.

Let us see what importance can be attached to what is said of Bernardo de la Salle, who, in 1679, descended from Canada to the Mississippi, and there built Fort Crevecoeur, according to M. Du Pratz, or Fort Prudhomme, according to others. What is certain amounts to this: that he only made a rapid incursion from Canada to the Mississippi, as any other adventurer might do, crossing the territories of another nation; that he returned to Quebec without any further result than that of an imperfect exploration of the country; and that he embarked at Quebec for France, from whence he returned in 1684 with an expedition composed of four vessels, commanded by Captain Beaujeau, to explore the mouth of the Mississippi. This expedition entered the Gulf of Mexico on the 12th of December of the following year. La Salle, being deceived in his reckoning by the currents of the gulf, could not find the mouth of the river, and, being overtaken by a storm on the coast of the province of Texas, he was obliged to take shelter in the Bay of St. Bernard. Two of his vessels were captured by the Spanish cruisers, another was lost in the bay, and Beaujeau returned to France in the only one that escaped. La Salle, having landed with some people and ten pieces of artillery, then built a small fort as a protection against the Indians, and was obliged to change his ground three different times; notwithstanding which, the Clancoates Indians, inhabiting the adjoining country, forced him to abandon the fort, and to retreat by the Rio de la Trinidad (Trinity river.) While on this retreat, he formed a project of penetrating into the interior of the country, to see if he could discover the fabulous mines of Santa Barbara; but he was assassinated on his route by his own people; and such was the result of the famous French expedition so much talked of. The Indians fell immediately on Fort St. Louis, and massacred the small garrison left by La Salle. The remainder of the French who accompanied him shared the same fate, being dispersed in different directions after the fall of their chief, they perished by the hands of the Indians.

In the meantime news of this incursion having reached Mexico, the Viceroy, fearful of a repetition of similar attempts, held a council of war to deliberate on the affair, in obedience to the royal order issued by Philip II., enjoining the extermination of all foreigners who would dare to penetrate into the Gulf of Mexico. An expedition was then resolved on, to be formed at Coahuila, under the command of Alonzo de Leon, to scour the country, and hunt out the French, if any were still remaining. Having set out with the necessary force, he arrived, on the 22d of April, 1689, at the place where La Salle had built Fort St. Louis, and on the 24th at the entrance of the bay, where he fell in with the remains of the French vessel that had been wrecked. Having heard in his march that some of La Salle's companions were still wandering about the country, or had taken refuge with the Indians, he shaped his course towards the nation of the Asimaïs, and was received by them with marks of friendship and respect. He, however, found no traces of the French, as no more of them were in existence.

Alonzo de Leon treated the Asimaïs with the greatest kindness, and called them Texas, which in their language signifies "friends." On the 22d of May, of the same year, he wrote to the Viceroy, informing him that there existed neither French nor any other foreigners in the whole country; that the Texas Indians possessed great attachment and good will to the Spaniards; and that it would be very proper to establish missions and garrisons throughout that country to prevent any future attempt or incursion of foreigners, and to preserve the conquest. This subject having been deliberated on in Mexico, the mission of St. Francisco de Texas was founded in 1690, after that nation had voluntarily submitted to the Crown of Spain. The Viceroy of Mexico continued to take effectual measures for protecting the country and preventing the intrusion of any French adventurers. The Court of Spain, on being informed of what had passed, renewed rigorous orders to the same effect, and also gave directions for the instruction and government of the Indians. Such were the objects of the expedition under Don Domingo de Teran, and of that which was effected under the command of Don Gregorio Salinas, in May, 1693. Since that period the province of Texas has continued in perfect tranquillity under the Spanish Government, and no further attempts were made by the French to penetrate into any part of it.

You see, sir, that the excursion of La Salle can give France no rights to that province, which had long before been acknowledged to be, and was, incorporated in the Spanish dominions. Such an excursion was, in fact, nothing more than the rash attempt of a foreigner to explore part of the territories of another nation, and is not substantially different from that made by Mr. Le Vaillant in the country of the Caffres, to the northeast of the Cape of Good Hope; by which, however France acquired no right to that part of the Dutch possessions, although they were still desert when the said Le Vaillant explored them. What territories are there in the world, especially in extensive dominions still new and thinly peopled, in which excursions of that nature have not been made by individuals of foreign countries, sometimes of neighboring nations, (which is the most common,) and sometimes of those which, although at a distance, actuated either by curiosity or ambition, undertake to explore unknown countries, inhabited by other people and governed by other Powers?

Nor can I refrain from recalling here what has been written and thoroughly investigated touching the pretended settlement of the French in the Illinois and Arkansas.

Whether they were some of the individuals of La Salle's expedition who had survived it, as M. Du Prat has it, or whether they were other adventurers from Canada, it seems beyond a doubt that some Frenchmen did penetrate as far as the Arkansas, towards the end of the seventeenth century, or the beginning of the eighteenth; on which point, however, the records of that period do not exactly agree. Enterprising people from Canada, both Frenchmen and natives, communicated with the Indian tribes, and penetrated far into the interior, to purchase cattle and for other purposes of traffic. Some of them, therefore, fixed themselves at the post of Arkansas, not as settlers, but as agents to carry on the trade between Canada and the natives of this district. The same took place at the post of the Illinois, long before the first foundation of the French colony of Louisiana was thought of.

Father Marquez, a Jesuit, had penetrated in 1671, as a missionary, into the Indian nation called Saulteux, as far as Chagwanigung, on Lake Superior; and in the year following one Saliet, with a view to explore the Mississippi, proceeded from Canada to Chagwanigung point. After joining Father Marquez, they both advanced and succeeded in penetrating to that river by the Ouisconsin. They met with a considerable population in the country of the Illinois, at the mouth of the river Moingora; and after promising to visit them on their return, they suggested to those Indians the idea of entering the country by the river since called the Illinois; and the Indians did so, and settled in a district known by the name of the Great Rock, or Great Penasco, about five leagues higher up than the mouth of the river. Saliet and Father Marquez could descend the Mississippi no farther than the Arkansas; and on their return from their excursion they found the Illinois encamped at the Great Penasco. Saliet continued his retreat, and Father Marquez determined to remain with these Indians, to instruct them in the principles of the Christian faith. In this attempt he was succeeded by other missionaries, who afterwards proceeded to found a church there, sufficiently regular, composed of Illinois and Canadians who had met and united with each other; these people were nowise subject to the French Government, but lived independent, in the manner of several Indian nations bordering on the United States. Several other Indians of the Miami and Shawanee tribes came and settled themselves near the Big Rock, or Great Penasco, but they disagreed, and soon after dispersed. A party of the Illinois went down the river and settled at Cahokia, on the left bank of the Mississippi, fifteen or sixteen miles below the mouth of the Illinois. Other missionaries followed them; and thus went on this kind of colony, informal or wandering, but always independent of, and unconnected with the French of Canada.

Let us now speak of the settlement of the French in the country called by them Louisiana. The first spot occupied by them in this country was the bay of Biloxi, about thirty leagues to the eastward of the Mississippi, in the year 1699, or, more strictly speaking, in 1700; and Mobile, a little farther eastward, where they established themselves, was, during two-and-twenty years, the capital of their new colony. From that time they observed the greatest caution in the settlements they formed on the banks of the Mississippi. Seventeen years had passed since the foundation of their colony, when they ventured to raise some huts on the left bank of that river; and this was on the spot now occupied by New Orleans, which five years afterwards became the capital of the colony, when the intimate relations between France and Spain, not only by virtue of the family compact, but more particularly by the elevation of Philip V. to the throne of Spain, favored the toleration of a dexterous encroachment on a territory which was acknowledged to belong to that monarchy. In 1722 the French succeeded in fixing some German families on the right bank of the river, opposite to the settlements which they already had above and below the new city of Orleans. They afterwards settled some Acadians a little higher up, and finally some others at Point Coupée. But the whole limits of these cottages or settlements did not extend to more than fifteen or twenty acres of land upon the front of the river; so that the French, seeing a want of cattle, and feeling the necessity of establishing herds to keep up a supply, turned their views to the extensive and fertile prairies of Attakapas, and the Governor of Louisiana thereupon applied to the commandant of the interior provinces of Mexico for permission to establish some herds only, which was frankly granted to him by the Spanish commandant. In fact they had nothing more than cattle establishments in Attakapas and Opelousas, when the colony was transferred to Spain in 1764. They had never gone farther; and it is to the Spaniards that the colony is indebted for the extensive population and cultivation of that part of the territory afterwards ceded back to France, and transferred by her to the United States; as was also the case in the settlements of La Fourche, Ayoyelles, the Rapides, and Ouachita, which did not previously exist, but were formed by the Spaniards within the proper limits of the monarchy.

From hence you will clearly see, sir, that so far from Spain having retained any point belonging to French Louisiana when she ceded it back by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, she left incorporated with it many points, settlements, and territories, which in truth did not belong, nor ever had belonged, to the said colony.

It would be too fatiguing to trace, step by step, all the incursions of the French from Canada, or from Louisiana, into other points of the Spanish dominions, by passing through Indian nations or uninhabited countries. I cannot, however, omit touching on the accidental circumstance which gave rise to their settlement at Kaskaskia, twenty leagues below Cahokia. The inhabitants of Illinois, who had no connexion or dependence whatever on Canada, at length undertook to go down the river and trade with the French at Biloxi and Mobile bay; and these traders having discovered fertile and beautiful prairies on the right of the small river Kaskaskia, several of the French settlers removed thither in the year 1703, and founded what is now the town of Kaskaskia; but they always lived independent and in alliance with the Indians, until the Louisiana company sent M. de Boisbriant, as the King's lieutenant, with troops, to reduce and direct this settlement. It was afterwards considerably increased in the hands of the French, who successively formed the settlements of Chartres, St. Philip, Prairie des Roches, and Prairie Dupont, but still, as you perceive, sir, on the left of the Mississippi; and it was not until several years afterwards that they settled St. Genevieve, opposite Kaskaskia, on the right of the said river—an inconsiderable settlement, which made no progress until the country was ceded to England.

In fine, all the written documents and historical evidence relating to French Louisiana agree in dividing it into Upper and Lower, and proving that Lower Louisiana is bounded on the north by bayou Manchac, by which it communicates from the river Mississippi to the Iberville; and that Upper Louisiana commences above the said bayou, the post of Natchez being the principal settlement of the French in that quarter, in whose neighborhood they cultivated tobacco. The settlement of Natchitoches, which they afterwards formed, was considered as depending on Upper Louisiana.

It would be easy to prove that this latter settlement was made by the French within the Spanish territory, and merely through the condescension or sufferance of the viceroys of Mexico, and the governors of the province of Texas. Before the French had founded New Orleans, there already existed the Spanish missions and settlements of San Francisco, La Purisima Concepcion, San José, and Nuestra Señora de la Guadalupe, at a very short distance from Natchitoches; and the right of property and possession on the part of the Crown of Spain to the whole of this territory, as far as the Mississippi, was notorious.

I am aware that the French attacked the mission of Texas, during the war between France and Spain, under the regency of the Duke of Orleans; that for this purpose they proceeded from the post of Natchitoches, and that the Spaniards retreated to San Antonio de Bexar, till the governor of the province, the Marquis de Valero, advanced to chastise and keep the enemy in check. This commander marched against them in 1719, drove them from the Spanish posts, and obliged them to shut themselves up in Natchitoches.

This expedition is connected with the authentic facts of which M. Du Prat has made up a ridiculous and fabulous tale, in his history of Louisiana, when he speaks of a Frenchman of the name of St. Dennis, and supposes certain conventions entered into between him and the Duke de Linares, Viceroy of Mexico. In 1715, St. Dennis penetrated from Mobile to the Spanish garrison of San Juan Bautista, with three companions and a passport, on pretence of going to buy cattle in the missions of Texas, but in reality to carry on a contraband trade and explore the country. Both he and his companions were seized and conveyed to Mexico. After a variety of adventures, St. Dennis made his escape, and was one of those who set out from Natchitoches with other Frenchmen to attack the inhabitants of Texas, as I have before stated.

After this event the Marquis de Aguayo came to Texas, re-established the old missions, and founded new ones, viz: Pilar, Adaes, Loreto, at the bay of Espiritu Santo, or St. Bernard, and Dolores, known by the name of Orquizaco; he greatly improved San Antonio de Bexar, and placed the whole frontier of the province in a respectable state. Thus the Spanish settlements remained tranquil until Louisiana was ceded to Spain, when the garrisons of Adaes and Orquiza were suppressed, as being no longer necessary.

As a further proof that the post of Natchitoches was acknowledged even by the French as being within the Spanish territory, I shall add two facts: the first is, that when Captain Don Domingo Ramon came with a party to Texas, after St. Denis and his followers were sent to Mexico, he paid a friendly visit to the French at Natchitoches, and entered that fort with the royal batova and insignia as a sign of the dominion and jurisdiction of Spain, to which the French made no opposition. The second fact is, that in the year 1742 the French Governor of Natchitoches being desirous to remove that fort, which had been injured by an inundation, somewhat farther from the bank of the Rio Roxo, (the Red river,) he waited on the Spanish Governor of the Adaes, Don Manuel de Sandoval, and requested the necessary permission to do so. Sandoval granted it, as the site to which he wished to remove it was no farther than a musket-shot from its former situation. Notwithstanding the Viceroy of Mexico, on being informed of this act of accommodation, highly disapproved it, and despatched Col. Don Francisco de Brito to Adaes, to supersede Governor Sandoval, and bring him under guard to Mexico, to be tried there before a court martial; which was carried into effect with all the rigor of the law.

It is unquestionable, from the historical series of facts, and the most unexceptionable documents, that the province of Texas extended to the Mississippi, and that the French never crossed the river into that district but through the sufferance or permission of the Spanish Governors; and that, in consequence of the former abusing the generosity with which they were permitted to trade with the Indians of that territory, and to hold, for that purpose only, the posts of Natchez and Natchitoches, positive orders were issued to drive the French from the whole district, and destroy the said posts. The Spanish commandant advanced with a sufficient force to execute those orders; but he acceded to the proposals of the French at Natchitoches, which were confined to this: that Arroyo Hondo, which is midway between Natchitoches and Adaes, should be considered as the dividing line, until the determination of the two Courts. In this state things remained without further change, and so continued until the cession of Louisiana to Spain relieved those provinces of Spanish America from all embarrassment and trouble from the French. But it always was an undeniable fact, established by the irresistible titles and documents, that the French neither held nor had held, to the westward of the Mississippi, in 1719, any other posts than Natchitoches, which they held merely by the condescension of Spain; and that the Spanish settlement of Adaes, only five leagues distant from the Rio Roxo, (Red river,) existed much earlier, and did so exist until Louisiana was transferred to Spain. The parochial records of Nacogdoches and Adaes, with the registers of births, baptisms, and deaths, attest it still more circumstantially, as well as the proceedings of the pastoral visit made in 1805, by Don Primo Feliciano Marin, bishop of the new kingdom of Leon, who visited the district of Adaes, and the whole province of Texas.

The right which Spain always had to all the territories to the north and east of New Mexico, as far as the right bank of the Mississippi and the Missouri, is proved with equal certainty. All these territories, and the different branches, falls, and waters of the Mississippi, were always comprehended within the line of the Spanish dominion in that part of America from the earliest periods of its discovery and conquest. Although the French penetrated several times from Mobile and Biloxi to different parts of that line, they never acquired any right to them. Their excursions were confined to trading, or smuggling, or exploring the country. The huts or posts which they had in some Indian nations were trifling establishments, clandestine and precarious, which they were unable to preserve. The Spaniards had traded much earlier than the French with all these Indian nations; with the Missourians, extending along the river of that name; the Padoucas, beyond the river La Platte; and, still farther to the Northwest, with the Latanes; and, finally, with several others, as being within the dominions of the Crown of Spain.

The French themselves never disputed the rights of the Spaniards to possession and property, nor laid claim to injure the rights of Spain on all occasions of making grants of land within her settlement of Louisiana; and the French settlers at all times carefully respected the right bank of the Mississippi, throughout its whole extent, as the well-known property of Spain. No memorial can be found declaratory of a contrary opinion, except a decree of Louis XIV., dated at Fontainebleau, on the 14th of September, 1712, in favor of M. Crozat, ceding to him and the company formed by him the French settlement of Louisiana, with an ideal and vague demarcation of boundaries, by extending them mentally to New Mexico and the English province of Carolina, and along the Mississippi from the sea to the Illinois, &c. It is evident that the Court of France did not then possess any knowledge of the geography of that country, or that New Mexico was considered as bordering on the Mississippi, notwithstanding Louis XIV. had carried his liberality so far in that grant as to give the French company even the river Mississippi and the Missouri. He might, with equal reason, have given those of the Amazons, the La Plata, and Oronoko. You are perfectly aware, sir, the expressions of this grant are vague and absurd. They never could alter the fixed limits of French Louisiana, or of the Spanish possessions. The grant of Louis XIV. was always considered as the act of a disordered imagination. The Spaniards constantly preserved their dominion over all the right bank of the Mississippi, and over all the territories and waters from the former to the right shore of the latter. Even the French themselves, notwithstanding this famous grant, never ventured to go beyond the certain and well-known limits of their settlement, or violate those of the territory and dominions of the Crown of Spain. It is therefore of no consequence to us if such a blunder was committed by those who penned the said grant at Fontainebleau. If a document of this nature was sufficient to dispossess a nation of its dominions, or of any part of them, what security could there be in any part of the possessions of independent Kingdoms and States? Can there be a mind capable of conceiving that such a paper can fail to be absurd and completely despicable, since it never took effect, has always been resisted as rash and extravagant, and since the incontestable rights of Spain to the property and possession of the said territories existed then, and do still exist? Certainly not.

The Court of France was immediately sensible of the extravagance of that grant, as no farther mention was made of it. On the contrary, when it ceded Louisiana to Spain, in 1764, M. Kerlet, who had been many years Governor of that Province, was ordered to draw up a memoir, containing a description of its proper extent and limits. This memoir, delivered by the Duke of Choiseul, Minister of France, to the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, as a supplement to the act of cession of Louisiana, agrees substantially with that which I have just now pointed out. I would carry this demonstration still farther, if I thought it necessary; and I will do so if you shall have anything to object to it. In the meantime, I now confine myself to declare to you, sir, and to the Government of the United States, in the name of the King, my master, that, although Spain has an original and indisputable right to all the right bank of the Mississippi, His Majesty has resolved to claim this right solely with a view to adhere to the uti possidetis, or state of possession in which the Crown of Spain was when she acquired Louisiana in 1764, and in which that of France was at the time she made the cession. His Majesty, paying due respect to all such treaties and conventions as have caused a change in the state of possession of the two nations in that part of America, religiously confines himself to the express period when Louisiana was circumscribed by the well-known extent and boundaries with which it passed into the hands of the United States.

As these boundaries, to the westward of the Mississippi, although always notorious and acknowledged, have not been marked out with the formality necessary to avoid doubts and arbitrary pretensions, and as it is only evident that they undoubtedly proceed from the Mexican Gulf, by the river Mermento, or Mermontayo, and Arroyo Hondo, by drawing a line between Natchitoches and Adaes, which crosses the Red river, and extends towards the Missouri, I have done no more than point out the basis for a line of demarcation; and after we have agreed on this basis, a commission, composed of Spaniards and Americans, formally appointed and authorized by their respective Governments, can, and ought alone, to examine and fix the boundaries between the possessions of the two Powers, keeping in view the documents exhibited on both sides, and comparing them on the spot with the points to which they refer. The basis I now speak of, as necessary for this demarcation of boundaries, must be sought for precisely in the most marked, leading, and notorious points, which showed the proper direction and extent of the territories of Spain, France, and England in 1763 and 1764, since we cannot seek for them in preceding periods, the possessions of the three Powers in this part of the American continent being then very different from what they have been after those periods, in virtue of public treaties, which are, and ought to be, inviolable.

The situation, therefore, of the three Powers, until 1763, was as follows: the Crown of Spain extended its dominion to the east, over the right side of the Mississippi, from its mouth to the mouth of the Missouri; and to the north, over the right side of the latter river, from its mouth to its source. Florida, already contracted by the intrusive establishment of Louisiana, commenced at the river Perdido, and extending eastward towards the river Santa Maria, (St. Mary's,) included the whole peninsula, which extends as far as the twenty-third degree of south latitude. Its northern boundary was not yet fixed. In addition to the colony of Louisiana, such as I have shown it was, and ought then to be, France possessed the territories of Upper and Lower Canada, extending south to a line running from the river Alivamoia, and following the chain of the Alleghanies until it struck above Chaleur bay. England extended her possessions to the south of the said line, on the coast of the Atlantic, from the river St. Mary to the river St. Croix, and added to those possessions all the territory lying north of the two Canadas, as far as Hudson's bay and Lake Winnipeg, which had been ceded to her by France, at the peace of 1713.

But France, as you know, sir, was, by the treaty of 1763, excluded from the continent of North America, with the exception of Louisiana, then reduced to the island of New Orleans, and to the tract of country to the north of Missouri, and extending to the British possessions. By that treaty, she ceded to England both the Canadas and all that part of Louisiana extending over the left side of the Mississippi from its source to the bayou Manchac, and thence following the left of the river Iberville, the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, the coast and islands, to the river Perdido. Spain ceded, in like manner, Florida to England, such as I have described it; and in the year 1764, which is the second period when it is necessary to distinguish and fix the basis referred to, she acquired, by cession from France, her remaining portion of old Louisiana. She afterwards acquired what France ceded to the English on the left of the Mississippi, and Florida, also, which she had ceded to them in 1763, as is proved by the treaty of 1783. This treaty, and those of 1763 and 1764, before mentioned, are those which it is necessary to keep in view, together with that of St. Ildefonso, by which Spain ceded back to France what she had received from her; and France accepted the delivery, declaring herself satisfied, and taking possession by virtue of an act of His Catholic Majesty, which expresses the retrocession of Louisiana by Spain to France such as she had received it from France in 1764.

The treaties between France and the United States, and between the latter and Spain, (the first in 1778, and the second in 1795,) must likewise be kept in view, to illustrate incontestable rights and establish unalterable principles. To the treaties just mentioned, your Government and His Catholic Majesty may add all such other titles and documents as may be thought necessary to remove or settle any doubt which may arise in the subject-matter, to the end that the basis of a demarcation may be laid down upon a due understanding, and established and fixed with the greatest possible exactness.

You are perfectly aware, sir, that there can be no other just mode of settling the dispute in relation to the question of boundaries, and that it is the one which has always been adopted by all nations in similar cases; it being the anxious wish of His Catholic Majesty that this demarcation may be so accomplished as to leave no room for doubt or controversy in future, by proceeding to it with good faith, and in a manner that may be satisfactory to both parties.

I therefore conclude this note with the same opinion expressed in my former one, namely, that it is indispensable to examine, ascertain, and agree on the points necessary and essential to the establishment of the true boundaries which separate, or ought to separate, Louisiana from the Spanish dominions; and that this can only be determined by the mode proposed. If you will be pleased to point out to me any other, which, while it fulfils that object, may be conciliatory and compatible with the rights and honor of the Crown of Spain, you may be assured, sir, that I shall adopt it with pleasure, as I shall thereby further the intentions of my Sovereign, which are to terminate as speedily as possible the disputes now pending in an amicable manner, so as to leave no spark of disagreement in future.

With these sentiments, I have the honor to offer myself to your disposal, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The same to the same.

WASHINGTON, January 8, 1818.

SIR: Having stated to you in my notes of the 29th of the last, and 5th of the present month, all that I thought proper and necessary on the subject of boundaries, that we may ascertain, discern, and fix with impartiality, justice, and good faith, those which divide, or ought to divide, Louisiana from the Spanish possessions situate to the east and west of that province, acquired from France by the United States, I now proceed to discuss the different points on which your Government founds claims against those of His Catholic Majesty.

As this matter was sufficiently discussed (ventilado) and placed in the strongest light of evidence by the Spanish Government, in the notes addressed by it to Mr. Pinckney, at Aranjuez, and afterwards to the American commission, composed of that gentleman and Mr. Monroe, and also in those which, in the last instance were addressed by it to Mr. Erving, at Madrid, I shall resume the subject briefly and precisely, merely touching on the principal points of the dispute, and showing, with simplicity and clearness, to what the state of the question is reduced, and in what manner it should be fairly and justly arranged.

I divide into two classes the points on which your Government demands satisfaction and indemnification of His Catholic Majesty. The first comprehends the injuries, losses, and damages, suffered by American citizens from Spanish authorities and subjects, and those suffered by the subjects of the Crown of Spain from American authorities and citizens. The second comprehends the losses, damages, and injuries, sustained by American citizens from captures made by French cruisers on the coasts of Spain, and condemned by French Consuls residing in the Spanish ports. To this the whole question of indemnification is reduced.

The points embraced by the first class are as follows: 1st. The damages and injuries unlawfully caused by Spanish authorities and subjects on American citizens, and by American authorities and citizens on the subjects of the Crown of Spain, in violation of the law of nations and of the existing treaty, during the war between Spain and Great Britain, which terminated at the peace of 1801. 2dly. Damages and injuries sustained by American citizens in consequence of the interruption of the place of deposit at New Orleans, by an order of the intendant of the royal treasury of Spain in the province of Louisiana. 3dly. Injuries, damages, and losses caused to citizens of the United States by Spanish authorities and subjects, and by American authorities and citizens to Spanish subjects, directly or indirectly, from the year 1801 until the period when the correspondent convention between the two Governments on all the points embraced by the question of spoliation shall be concluded and signed.

Those which are comprehended in the first point are acknowledged to be evidently founded on justice; and, to carry them into effect, there exists ever since 1802 a convention stipulated and signed between Spain and the United States. You are aware, sir, that the suspension of this convention did not originate with His Catholic Majesty's Government. His Majesty is ready to give full effect to it; and on the basis of that convention we can establish and agree on what may be most just, suitable, and expeditious, to make a reciprocal satisfaction for the aforesaid injuries and losses, comprehending in the convention to be stipulated and signed for that purpose all the injuries and losses respectively suffered since 1801 to the present, because these two points only are distinct in point of time; but, as you are perfectly aware, they are, in all other respects, of a like nature, and therefore of equal rights and justice.

The first and third points are consequently to be acknowledged as substantially forming only one, subject to the examination and decision of the joint commission which is to determine the necessary compensation, in virtue of the convention to be stipulated on the basis of that of 1802.

The second point, namely, that of the suspension of the deposit at New Orleans, might be omitted. You are aware, sir, that it lasted but a very short time, and in the depth of Winter, when the exportation of the produce of the Western States was very inconsiderable, and very hazardous and difficult; that, moreover, the order of the Intendant produced no other inconvenience to the American citizens than the trifling one of loading in the stream instead of laying their boats along the quay at New Orleans; and that the said order of the Intendant was an arbitrary act, duly disapproved of by His Catholic Majesty, and for which he directed his Minister to give suitable satisfaction to the United States in his royal name. The United States having received it, this affair ought from that time to be considered as terminated.

On the other hand, you cannot but admit that His Catholic Majesty was not bound to continue the deposit at New Orleans after the termination of the precise period stipulated by the treaty of 1795, by which His Catholic Majesty only agreed to designate another spot for the said deposit, upon the banks of the Mississippi. As this new spot was to be to the satisfaction of the United States, it was for them to point out and ask for it. The suspension ordered by the Intendant, although highly disapproved by the Spanish Government, was in consequence of the scandalous contraband and abuses by which, under cover of the deposit, enormous frauds were committed on the royal revenue. By the treaty no provision was made for this case, nor was there any stipulation relative to the time which was to intervene during the removal of the deposit from New Orleans to another spot on the bank of the Mississippi, or to the intermediate period between the suspension of the said deposit and the assigning another situation for it.

The Government of Spain was, therefore, not bound to become answerable for the losses and injuries eventually sustained by the short interruption of the deposit, since such obligations could only grow out of the stipulations of that treaty, which does not contain a single word that has the most distant allusion to such an obligation or engagement on the part of His Catholic Majesty.

Notwithstanding these reasons, and various others which I could adduce, to prove that the Government of Spain cannot be bound to make satisfaction for the aforesaid losses and damages,

15th Cox. 2d Sess.—55

His Catholic Majesty is disposed to yield to the reclamation of the United States on this point, provided they still insist on it, and to submit it, with the others spoken of, to the investigation and decision of the joint commission. There will, therefore, be no difficulty in also including this point, as far as it relates to injuries really caused by the order of the Intendant of New Orleans, in the convention to be formed and signed, if required by you, it being His Catholic Majesty's desire to give continued proofs to the United States of his frankness, good faith, and condescension. I now proceed to the claim for losses and injuries committed on citizens of the United States by French cruisers and tribunals, in the capture of American vessels on the coasts of Spain, and their condemnation in Spanish ports, forming the object of the second part of this question, or that embracing the points of the second class, in the order of the enumeration I have adopted.

This part of the question was discussed in a very luminous manner in the notes addressed by His Catholic Majesty's Government to the American Ministers on the 10th of February and 5th of March, 1805; and you are aware that no reply was made on the part of the United States, weakening in the least the force of the principles and the truth of the facts on which the opposition of His Catholic Majesty to a responsibility for those damages and injuries was grounded. You will agree with me, sir, that there is no possibility of deciding, by a general rule, the extent of the responsibility of a nation on whose coasts and ports aggressions have been committed by another against a third party, as it depends in a great degree on the circumstances of the case, and the particular stipulations binding on nations.

By the treaty between Spain and the United States, the obligation of Spain is reduced to exercise its good offices with the offending party, and to aid the claims of the party aggrieved. "Each party shall endeavor, (says the treaty,) by all means in their power, to protect and defend all vessels and other effects belonging to the citizens or subjects of the other, which shall be within the extent of their jurisdiction, by sea or by land, and shall use all their efforts to recover and cause to be restored to the right owners their vessels and effects, which may have been taken from them within the extent of their said jurisdiction, whether they are at war or not with the Power whose subjects have taken possession of the said effects."

On the part of Spain this has been done; and if her efforts have not produced the desired effect, the fault does not rest with her. Besides, the injuries done by French privateers on the coasts and in the ports of Spain to American citizens have a particular character, which relieves the Government of Spain from all obligation to indemnify them for those losses, even although such obligation had existed. The United States were not at war with France, consequently their recourse, as the aggrieved party, was always open to the Government and tribunals of the aggressor. Spain was then in alliance with France, and both were at war with Great Britain. She, therefore, could not prevent the privateers of her ally from entering her ports, as they were not fitted out against the Americans, but against the English. If these privateers, after going on their cruise, committed aggressions on American vessels, on pretence of considering them or their cargoes as English, the Spanish Government could neither foresee nor prevent it. The injuries were already done before it was apprized of them. Neither was it in the Spanish ports where the injury was completed, but in France, by the tribunals of cassation, to which the Americans appealed from the decision of the French Consuls residing in the ports of Spain. It was unquestionably in France that the offence and injury originated, and in France were they consummated. How, then, can indemnification be claimed of Spain for such injuries, and not of France, who was the cause of them, and the Power enabled to compel the aggressors to make due satisfaction, as they were her subjects, and had given the requisite bonds in her courts for their good conduct in their cruises? You cannot but be sensible, sir, that, according to every principle of reason and justice, it would evidently and unquestionably be monstrous to claim these indemnifications of Spain, as the Power existed then, and still does exist, which caused the injuries here treated of.

I would go still further to show that, by no established principle of the law of nations, can Spain be considered responsible for such indemnifications, not even indirectly, in case France should refuse to make them. I would cite, among others, the case in which Sir W. Scott, judge of the High Court of Admiralty of Great Britain, decided that prizes made by a belligerent, and carried into the ports of a Power its ally, and there condemned, are justly and lawfully condemned according to the law of nations; and that the owners of the property prior to its condemnation have no longer a claim to it after condemnation has taken place. From this and other decisions, it follows that the Government to whose subjects the property condemned belonged has no ground to bring forward complaints or claims against the Government of the country where the prizes were made, because the condemnation is conformable to the law of nations, the sentence pronouncing it is valid, and the authority condemning the property legal, and proceeded according to rule. This doctrine is well known and acknowledged in the United States, as also the principle that, when a nation has employed its good offices, and taken such means as are in its power to procure satisfaction for the offence, and obtain compensation for the injuries committed on its coasts and in its ports, on a friendly or neutral nation, it is bound to nothing more, although its good offices and endeavors may not have produced the desired effect. This principle was applied by Mr. Jefferson, in his letter of the 5th September, 1793, to Mr. George Hammond. It is admitted by the best civilians, and agrees perfectly with the obligations of Spain towards the United States resulting from the existing treaty between the two nations. I mean, however, in case Spain had not been the ally of France at the period, (because, even in that case, the principle I have just indicated would govern,) but, being then the ally of France in the war against Great Britain, she might certainly employ, among the exceptions exempting her from all responsibility in the case here treated of, the principle which served as the ground of Sir W. Scott's decision in the British admiralty court. But I do not consider it necessary further to illustrate these legal objections of the Government of Spain against the claim of your Government for the aforesaid injuries, inasmuch as this capital exception attends it, namely, that satisfaction for those injuries was already made to the United States by France; and, consequently, this affair is, and ought to be, considered as settled and terminated. This essential exception makes it superfluous to produce others, since the obligation spoken of, which was and could only be but one, is thereby evinced to have been extinguished. The French Government has positively declared that, "in the special convention concluded between France and the United States, this point was settled; and that the said convention, by which this claim and demand of the United States for due compensation for the losses and damages now spoken of were attended to and redeemed, was ratified in 1802, together with the treaty of cession or sale of Louisiana;" that is to say, that the amount of the said injuries and losses was then estimated and compensated in the price stipulated for Louisiana; so that full compensation was then made to the United States for all that was estimated and agreed on between the French and American Governments as forming the value of the said losses and injuries. The French Ambassador at Madrid gave a verbal assurance to this effect to His Catholic Majesty's Minister of State, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France gave a similar assurance to the Spanish Ambassador at Paris. His Catholic Majesty also demanded a formal and categorical answer of the French Government on this point, which formal declaration I here copy; it is thus expressed in the note transmitted by the Minister of France to the Ambassador of His Catholic Majesty:

"BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAULT,

"8th Thermidor, 12th year, (July 27, 1804.)

"MONSIEUR L'AMBAassadeUR: I have duly laid before His Imperial Majesty the note which you did me the honor to address to me, dated the 24th July, relative to the discussion which has taken place between the Court of Spain and the Government of the United States. I shall not fail immediately to submit to him the more ample explanations which your excellency announces your intentions of making to me, both verbally and in writing, on this dispute, which seems to threaten the good understanding existing between the United States and your Court. Although I might yet defer giving my opinion to your excellency, in consequence of your intention to furnish me with the explanatory statements which you announce, I do not hesitate to inform you by anticipation that His Imperial Majesty cannot but be extremely sensible to the uncertain and uneasy position in which two Powers in amity with France are placed by this misunderstanding, and that he will certainly do whatever may depend on him to prevent its coming to an unfortunate issue.

"It is several months since I was informed by the Chargé d'Affaires near the Federal Government of the pretensions of that Government relative to a portion of country bordering on Florida, which has become a great object of ambition to the Americans, in relation to the establishment of their revenue system; and it seemed to me, from this information, that it was important that the Federal Government should use all the means in its power to obtain the annexation of this frontier portion of Florida to Louisiana; but the opinion due to the justice and moderation which distinguish the personal character of the President of the United States has not, nor does it yet permit me to think that menaces, provocation, and groundless hostility may be considered by him as the most suitable means to enable the United States to acquire a portion of territory belonging to a foreign Power which suits their convenience.

"Respecting the second point in dispute, which your excellency does me the honor to speak of in your note, I must say that I had previously no knowledge of it. And, indeed, if I had been informed that His Catholic Majesty's Ministers had carried their condescension for the Government of the United States so far as to engage themselves towards it for indemnifying violations pretended to have been committed by France, I should certainly have received orders from my Government to express the dissatisfaction which France must feel on the occasion of so unseemly a deference; and this dissatisfaction would have been expressed still more warmly to the Government of the United States than to that of Spain. There is every reason to suppose that the Court of Spain, by thus yielding to an improper demand, has emboldened the American Government, and determined it to become pressing, and even menacing on this occasion. As for the rest, explanations formerly given to your Court on this point, as well as those which have been authorized to be given to the Government of the United States by the Chargé d'Affaires of His Imperial Majesty, must enable you to judge of the opinion formed by His Majesty on this question, which, having already been the subject of a long negotiation, and of a formal convention between France and the United States, cannot again become a subject of discussion.

"Such, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, are the remarks that I have thought proper to make in the first instance, in answer to the preliminary note of your excellency. In addition, I must observe that, in my opinion, the demonstrations which appear to me to have given your Government the uneasiness it has charged you to express are somewhat exaggerated, either from the impression they have produced at Madrid, or from the construction, possibly too extensive, which the Minister of the United States to His Catholic Majesty may have, perhaps, given to his instructions. There is no room to suppose that a Government, anxious as that of the United States is to establish a general opinion of its wisdom and moderation, would resolve on engaging in an unjust war through motives of ambition; but as the United States attach great importance to the acquisition of a part of Florida suited to their convenience, it is not to be doubted that they will make every effort to obtain it. The ground of this dispute, therefore, rests entirely on this point. Perhaps the Federal Government may have thought that it would tend to promote a negotiation for exchange, by exciting a diplomatic quarrel. The wisdom of His Catholic Majesty will certainly suggest to him what is proper to be done on this occasion, with a view to terminate a dispute which, I have no doubt, will incessantly be revived, so long as no change shall take place in the actual relative position of Louisiana and the Floridas; but on this point it is for the wisdom of His Catholic Majesty to decide. The United States are not founded in making any claim on His Majesty. A positive declaration was made to them that Louisiana was delivered to them such, and with the same extent it had when acquired by France; and this declaration will again be made to them as often and as positively as His Catholic Majesty will desire it.

"I request your excellency to receive the assurances of my highest consideration.

"CHA. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

"To Admiral TRAVINA,

"Ambassador of His Catholic Majesty."

You see, sir, that this declaration of the French Government is conclusive, and that the responsibility for losses and injuries caused by French cruisers and tribunals on the coasts and in the ports of Spain is removed from the period of that agreement; and that to renew a claim for what has been already paid and satisfied would be exacting double reparation for one and the same injury, and double payment for one and the same debt. Notwithstanding, if the United States have still a claim for the complete fulfilment of this satisfaction and payment, His Catholic Majesty is ready to unite his good offices and earnest requests to this claim of your Government on that of France, in order that she may perform, and cause to be performed, whatever may be justly required in behalf of American citizens who have sustained losses and injuries by her cruisers and tribunals. To this the obligation of Spain, in the present case, is reduced; and His Catholic Majesty's Government offers immediately to sustain all the just pretensions which the Government of the United States may be desirous to form against the Government of France on this point, or to demand of it all such explanations as may be judged necessary to clear up all doubts, if any are yet entertained by the United States, on this matter.

This point, then, being separated from those connected with the question of claims for injuries, losses, and damages, because that is already settled between France and the United States, or is to be settled with France directly, if anything still remains to be performed, we can agree upon a just and suitable mode of determining a reciprocal satisfaction for the injuries, losses, and damages, before spoken of, and included in the three points of the first class as enumerated in this note, in order that we may proceed more clearly and methodically. These three points, as I have before said, will be submitted to the judgment and decision of the joint commission, in virtue of the convention to be formed on the basis of that of 1802, simplifying and rectifying it in such manner as will insure its most expeditious and faithful execution.

In this note, and the two others which I have already had the honor to address to you, are contained all the points in dispute between the Government of His Catholic Majesty and that of the United States; and, to avoid confounding them with each other, I have treated them in their regular order, with precision, simplicity, and clearness. You can examine each of them, sir, with the impartiality and rectitude which distinguish your character; and I flatter myself that all the motives and grounds of the controversy will be completely removed by your discernment and wisdom, as you will not fail to acknowledge the irresistible force of what has been, and is now, demonstrated on the part of the Government of Spain.

When the different points treated of in each of these notes with the necessary discrimination are considered, and a decision formed on each of them, it is requisite that we should definitively settle and terminate the controversy, without leaving any room for dispute in future.

This general and definitive arrangement of all the points in dispute must, by its nature and circumstances, precede the negotiation for the exchange or cession of the Floridas, since, until it be determined and settled what are the territories on the frontier which belong to Spain, and what are those which belong to the United States, it is impossible to estimate the equivalent to be given to Spain for the two Floridas. Nevertheless, as it is the earnest desire of His Catholic Majesty to meet the wishes of the United States in everything that may be compatible with the rights and honor of his Royal Crown, you may, sir, devise and propose a mode by which we may at one and the same time adjust all the points of the controversy, and stipulate the exchange or cession of the Floridas, in case your Government should not agree to our previously settling the points connected with the question of boundaries, and establishing a convention, in conformity to the basis of that of 1802, for the mutual compensation of losses and injuries, according to the order I have adopted in my note.

I expect, therefore, your answer, sir, whether it be confined distinctly to the subject of each one of my notes, according to their respective order, or to propose a mode embracing all the points comprehended in them, by which we may have them collectively settled in the negotiation which is to be entered upon for the exchange or cession of the Floridas. In this proceeding you will perceive, sir, a certain proof of the frankness and good faith of the Spanish Government, and of the sincere and friendly sentiments entertained by the King, my master, for the United States.

I conclude with the renewed assurances of my respects, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The same to the same.

WASHINGTON, January 8, 1818.

SIR: In the National Intelligencer of the 6th of this month, I have seen published the official notice of the occupation of Amelia Island by the troops of the United States. I had already anticipated this unpleasant event, by the note which I had the honor to address you on the 6th of last month, in which I remonstrated, in the name of His Catholic Majesty, against the measures announced in that part of the President's Message to both Houses of Congress which manifested an intention to invade and forcibly seize on places and territories belonging to the Crown of Spain. Having received no answer to that note, I now feel myself obliged to repeat its contents to you, and to protest, as I now do strongly protest, in the name of the King, my master, against the occupation of Amelia Island, effected by the naval and military forces of this Republic, destined to operate against that island, forming a part of East Florida, one of the possessions of the Spanish monarchy on this continent.

Whatever may have been the motives on which the Government of the United States have founded their adoption of this measure, it cannot but be considered by all nations as a violent invasion of the dominions of Spain at the time of a profound peace, when His Catholic Majesty omits nothing to give the most generous proofs of his perfect friendship and high consideration for the United States.

I therefore trust that, upon your communicating this solemn reclamation and protest to the President, he will be pleased to direct that suitable orders be given to the American commanders at Amelia Island, and on that station, forthwith to restore the said island, together with all its dependencies, to His Catholic Majesty, and to deliver up the same to the Spanish commandant, and officers presenting themselves for that purpose, in the name of their Sovereign.

It is also my duty to represent to you, sir, that, at the time of the invasion and occupation of that island by the American troops, there was, and I believe still is, a considerable property belonging to Spanish subjects, which, in all cases, it is required by strict justice should be delivered to the owners, which, I doubt not, has already been, or will be done, in a due and proper manner, care being taken in the mean time that it be not removed or suffer injury.

I await your reply to this reclamation and protest, that I may be enabled to give seasonable intelligence and instructions to the Governor of St. Augustine, and to the Captain General of the Island of Cuba, provided the President, as I flatter myself, will resolve on the prompt restitution and delivery of Amelia and its dependencies to His Catholic Majesty's Government.

I cannot by any means doubt that this will be effected, confiding, as I do, in the high rectitude of the President, and in the inviolable principles of public faith, on which the security of nations reposes.

I have the honor to renew the assurances of my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis De Onis.

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1818.

SIR: Your letters of 29th December, and of 5th and 8th of the present month, have been received, and laid before the President of the United States.

He has seen, not without surprise and regret, that they consist almost entirely of renewed discussions upon the several points of difference which have so long subsisted between the United States and Spain—discussions which had been exhausted in the correspondence between the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid and your Government in the years 1802 and 1803, and more especially in that between Don Pedro Cevallos and the special extraordinary mission of the United States to your Court in 1805—a mission instituted by the American Government, under the influence of the most earnest desire to terminate amicably, and to the satisfaction of both the parties, all those differences, but which, after five months of negotiation at Aranjuez, issued in the refusal of Spain to give satisfaction to the United States upon any one of the causes of complaint which were to be adjusted, or even to settle the question of boundaries existing between the United States and the Spanish provinces bordering upon them. The President considers that it would be an unprofitable waste of time to enter again at large upon topics of controversy which were at that time so thoroughly debated, and upon which he perceives nothing in your notes which was not then substantially urged by Don Pedro Cevallos, and to which every reply essential to elucidate the rights, and establish the pretensions on the part of the United States, was then given. For proof of which, I beg leave merely to refer you to the letters of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos, of 28th January, 26th February, 8th and 16th March, 9th and 20th April, and 12th May, 1805. I am instructed by the President to propose to you an adjustment of all the differences between the two countries, by an arrangement on the following terms:

1. Spain to cede all her claims to territory eastward of the Mississippi.

2. The Colorado, from its mouth to its source, and from thence to the northern limits of Louisiana, to be the western boundary; or, to leave that boundary unsettled for future arrangement.

3. The claims of indemnities for spoiliations, whether Spanish, or French within Spanish jurisdiction, and for the suppression of the deposit at New Orleans, to be arbitrated and settled by commissioners, in the manner agreed upon in the unratified convention of 1802.

4. The lands in East Florida, and in West Florida, to the Perdido, to be made answerable for the amount of the indemnities which may be awarded by the Commissioners under this arbitration; with an option to the United States to take lands and pay the debts, or to sell the lands for the payment of the debts, distributing the amount received equally, according to the amount of their respective liquidated claims, among the claimants. No grants of land subsequent to the 11th of August, 1802, to be valid.

5. Spain to be exonerated from the payment of the debts, or any part of them.

These proposals do not materially differ from those made to Don Pedro Cevallos on the 12th of May, 1805. The President has seen nothing in any events which have since occurred, nor in the contents of your notes, which can afford a reason or a motive for departing from them. Of the motives for coming to an immediate arrangement, the urgency cannot escape your attention. The events which have recently occurred in a part of the territory which you have informed me the King of Spain is willing to cede to the United States, those which are notoriously impending over the remaining part of that territory yet in the possession of Spain, make it indispensably necessary that the ultimate determination of your Government in this negotiation should be acted on without delay. The explanations requested by your notes of the 6th December and 8th January, of the motives of this Government in the occupation of Amelia Island, have been given in the Message of the President to Congress of the 13th instant, and cannot fail of being satisfactory to your Government. You see it there distinctly and explicitly declared that the measures which this Government found itself under the necessity of adopting in relation to that island were taken not with a view to conquest from Spain. You well know that, if Spain could have kept, or recovered the possession of it from the trifling force by which it was occupied, the American Government would have been spared the necessity of the measure which was taken, and which was dictated by the duty of protecting the interests as well of this country as of those with whom we are in friendly commercial relations, including Spain herself. But Spain cannot expect that the United States should employ their forces for the defence of her territories, or to rescue them, for her exclusive advantage, from the adventurers who are projecting and in the act of executing expeditions against them from territories without the jurisdiction of the United States. Neither can the United States permit that the adjoining territories of Spain should be misused by others for purposes of annoyance to them.

Under these circumstances, the President is persuaded that you will perceive the necessity either of accepting the proposals herein contained as the basis of an adjustment of the long-standing differences between the United States and Spain, or of offering such as can, by any possibility, be acceptable to this Government, without reverting to a course of proceeding the only result of which must be further procrastination.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 24, 1818.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 16th of this month, by which I see, with great regret, that, in acknowledging the receipt of those I had the honor to address to you on the 29th of last month, and the 5th and 8th of the present, you omit to answer them, and decline taking into consideration the indisputable facts and grounds, and the irresistible arguments advanced in them, in relation to each of the points embraced by the dispute set on foot by the Government of the United States. You say it is useless again to discuss the facts, reasons, and arguments produced by the Spanish Government in the years 1802 and 1803, and in 1805, the American Plenipotentiaries, and the special extraordinary mission conjointly with them, having then replied to the different points of the notes of the Spanish Ministry in a manner capable of elucidating the respective rights of each of the two Powers, and establishing the pretensions of the Government of the United States; for proof of which you refer me to the letters of Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney to His Catholic Majesty's Minister, Don Pedro Cevallos, of the 28th of January, 26th of February, 8th and 16th of March, 9th and 20th of April, and 12th of May, 1805.

I think it proper to observe, in the first place, that although the facts, grounds, and arguments then produced by the Spanish Government do not differ essentially from those stated in my notes, their irresistible and conclusive force is neither altered nor in any manner impaired. Truth is of all times; and reason and justice are founded on immutable principles. It is on these principles that the rights of the Crown of Spain are founded to the territories eastward and westward of Louisiana, claimed by your Government as making part of that province—rights of immemorial property and possession, never disputed, but always notorious, and acknowledged by other nations.

In the second place, I must remark to you that, throughout the whole correspondence on this subject between the Ministry of the United States and that of His Catholic Majesty, there is not a single fact, or a single argument, that can affect the certainty or decisive force of the facts, grounds, and reasons which support and determine the aforesaid rights of the Crown of Spain. There does not appear to be a single incident to give the smallest support to the pretensions of your Government. All the vague positions on which it has been attempted to found them have been refuted and dissipated by the Spanish Government, by a demonstration so luminous and convincing as to leave no alternative to reason to resist it.

To lay all this aside, and merely to say "that it is a matter already thoroughly debated, on which nothing further essential can be urged, and that the American Government insists on maintaining a contrary opinion," is to adopt an arbitrary course, because, this opinion not being supported by any solid foundation, and being, as it is, diametrically opposite to the unquestionable result of facts, and to the most incontestable principles and arguments, does not, nor can it, give to the United States any right to the pretensions they have formed. Neither can it be required that the Government of Spain should subscribe to this opinion, and renounce its rights to the territory which the United States wish to possess in the Spanish provinces bordering on those States, since that opinion, as I have already said, is altogether groundless and arbitrary, and since, on those rights, there neither does nor can there fall any doubt.

It is the sincere wish of His Catholic Majesty that a just mode of amicably settling all pending differences may be adopted, and he has authorized me for this purpose; but neither the powers he has conferred on me, nor my own sense of duty, permit me to enter into an arrangement which is not based upon the principles of common justice, combined in good faith with the suitable considerations of reciprocal utility or convenience. Being anxiously desirous of carrying the wishes and frank dispositions of my Sovereign into execution, I suggested to you, in our last verbal conference, the expediency of your making to me such proposals as you might think fit to reconcile the rights and interests of both Powers, by a definitive arrangement of the differences pending between them. Since you communicated the present state of things to the President, you have proposed to me in your note a plan of arrangement or adjustment embracing the question of boundaries, and that of indemnities, which is as follows:

To settle the former, you propose "that Spain shall cede all her claims to territory eastward of the Mississippi, (that is to say, the two Floridas;) and that the Colorado, from its mouth to its source, and from thence to the northern limits of Louisiana, shall be the western boundary of that province."

I have expressed in one proposal what you have stated in two, as both are reduced to the cession of territory by Spain. It is not only proposed that Spain shall cede both Floridas to the United States, but that she shall likewise cede to them the vast extent of Spanish territory comprehended within the line following the whole course of the Colorado. I presume that it is the river Colorado of Natchitoches you speak of, and not of another bearing the same name, and which is still farther within the limits of the Spanish provinces. I leave it to you, sir, to examine the import of these two proposals, and to see whether they are compatible with the principles of justice, or with those of reciprocal utility or convenience. It is demanded of Spain to cede provinces and territories of the highest importance, not only to the eastward, but to the westward of Louisiana, and that without proposing any equivalent or compensation.

To settle the question of indemnities, you make the following proposals:

1. That indemnity for spoliations on American citizens, committed by Spaniards or French within the jurisdiction of Spain, as well as for injuries sustained by American citizens by the interruption of the deposit at New Orleans, shall be settled by a joint commission, as agreed upon in the convention of 1802.

2. The lands in East Florida, and in West Florida to the Perdido, to be made answerable to the United States for the amount of the indemnities which may appear to be due by Spain to American citizens on the settlement to be made by commissioners appointed according to the convention of 1802; it being at the option of the United States to take the lands and pay the amount of the indemnities according to the award on the claims, or to sell the lands, and effect the payment with the proceeds of the sales. To this proposal you add, that all grants of land subsequent to the 11th of August, 1802, are to be null and void.

3. That Spain shall be exonerated from the payment of the debts, or any part of them.

Before I reply to these three proposals, I must repeat the uniform declaration of the Spanish Government to the United States, that His Catholic Majesty is, and always has been, ready to settle the question of indemnities, with a view to the full satisfaction of the just claims of the parties interested; and that His Majesty has always manifested the same sincere desire to settle definitively the question of boundaries to the satisfaction of both Powers; and that, if neither of these objects has been accomplished, it has not depended upon the Government of Spain. The contrary is evident, beyond the possibility of denial, from the official correspondence between His Catholic Majesty's Minister of State, and the Plenipotentiaries of the American Government, who suspended and broke off the negotiation at Aranjuez, after having obstinately refused to accept the modifications founded on strict justice which were proposed by the Spanish Government.

I now proceed to state the most obvious and essential difficulties which render your three proposals for the settlement of indemnities inadmissible. I observe that, in speaking of them, you only mention the indemnity for spoliations suffered by American citizens, and omit that which is equally due to Spaniards for spoliations committed on them by the citizens and authorities of this Republic, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaty. I also observe that you not only omit this indispensable basis of reciprocity and common justice, but propose the immediate cession of both the Floridas, which two Spanish provinces are to be retained by the United States as an indemnity or payment of what may appear to be due by Spain to American citizens, according to the arbitration of the joint commission.

You cannot fail to admit, sir, that this proposal, independent of its injustice, is offensive to the dignity and honor of His Catholic Majesty. It is unjust, because it demands an indemnity or anticipated payment of claims yet to be proved and liquidated, while, at the same time, it provides for no correspondent indemnity or payment of what may be due by the United States to Spanish subjects. It is offensive to the dignity and honor of Spain, because, by the very fact of demanding this anticipation, a want of confidence in the integrity and punctuality in His Catholic Majesty's Government is manifested, whereas a single instance does not exist of Spain having failed in fulfilling her engagements; the most scrupulous exactness, good faith, and strict observance of the point of honor, having at all times invariably formed the distinguishing traits of her character. It therefore becomes unnecessary to point out to you the enormous disproportion between the value of the two Floridas, and that of the probable amount of the claims of American citizens on the Government of Spain, after they are ascertained and liquidated. This disproportion will be still more enormous when you consider that, in the first of the three proposals, to which I am now replying, is included the indemnity for spoliations on citizens of this Republic by French cruisers and consuls on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, and by the tribunals of cassation in France, confirming the condemnation of American prizes.

It has been proved to mathematical demonstration that Spain neither is nor can be responsible in any way for this indemnity. It is France which must be responsible, if she has not already satisfied the claim, as her Government assures she has done.

Nor can I omit to declare to you, sir, that the pretension of annulling the grants of lands in Florida since August, 1802, would be in opposition to all the principles of justice. These grants are made in a lawful manner, and by a lawful authority. Spain was the owner and peaceful possessor of those lands. She had then an indisputable right to make the grants you allude to, as she now has to the property of the territory afterwards forcibly taken possession of by the United States, since a violent dispossession never deprives an individual or nation of their lawful rights. I proceed to your last proposal, which is, that on the admission of those preceding, Spain shall be exonerated from all obligation to pay the debts or claims which may be due to American citizens on their settlement and liquidation by the joint commission. I conceive this to be the import of the expressions, stating that "Spain shall be exonerated from the payment of the debts, or any part of them." This proposition is a corollary of the two preceding it, since, if Spain should cede the two Floridas to the United States as an indemnity or compensation for the losses and injuries done to the citizens of this Republic, she would necessarily be exonerated from this responsibility, the cession being, in such case, equivalent to a final discharge of the claims referred to. I go farther. Supposing your last two proposals for the definitive adjustment of the question of indemnities to be admitted and carried into effect, the one preceding, namely, that which refers this business to the award of commissioners to be appointed by both Governments, agreeably to the convention of 1802, would be useless and contradictory. As none of the proposals offered by you provide any indemnity for the losses and injuries caused to Spaniards, nor even make any mention of them; and as by the two last proposals, if admitted, the losses and injuries sustained by American citizens would be indemnified and compensated, according to the wishes of your Government, and Spain would consequently be exonerated from all responsibility on this head, it is clear that the business would then be settled and canceled, and there would be no necessity for recurring to arbitration.

Finally, I cannot refrain from expressing my great concern at not being able in any degree to reconcile the proposals you have made me by order of the President with the inviolable principles of common justice; and on perceiving that on the part of the United States no basis is presented of a due reciprocity for the adjustment of the differences pending, the said proposals being altogether inadmissible.

I repeat to you, sir, that the King, my master, being desirous to meet the wishes of the United States, in respect to the cession of the Floridas, although it is well known how highly important those two provinces are to cover and secure the possessions of Spain in that part of America, His Majesty is ready to cede them, provided he be compensated by an equivalent in territory belonging to the United States, and bordering on the Spanish possessions; and it is under this idea that the powers and instructions I have from my Government are conceived. But you cannot fail to admit that the plan of adjustment proposed involves exorbitant and enormous sacrifices to the prejudice of Spain, since, without offering any equivalent or compensation on the part of the United States, it requires not only the cession of both the Floridas, but also that of immense territories belonging to the Spanish monarchy westward of Louisiana; and that, in relation to the question of reciprocal indemnities, it only comprehends those respecting American citizens, omitting those due to the Crown and subjects of His Catholic Majesty. This plan of adjustment would amount to the following one: "Give me all I wish to ask, and give up all you may justly claim or show is yours." I am, however, perfectly persuaded that this neither is nor can be your intention, or that of your Government; and that, in making these proposals for an adjustment, your only object was to afford me an opportunity to make such as you might consider just and admissible.

I shall, therefore, point out to you such as I conceive to be founded in justice and reciprocal convenience, and therefore cannot fail to meet the wishes of the United States.

1. "The dividing line between Louisiana and the Spanish possessions to be established in one of the branches of the Mississippi, either that of La Fourche, or of the Atchafalaya, following the course of that river to its source. Spain to cede the two Floridas to the United States in full and complete sovereignty."

In case this proposal should not appear admissible to your Government, the following may be substituted: "The uti possidetis, or state of possession in 1763, to form the basis, and the western line of division to be established from the sea, at a point between the rivers Carcasa and the Mermento, or Mermentao, running thence by Arroyo Hondo, till it crosses the Colorado of Natchitoches, between that point and Adaes, thence northward to a point to be fixed and laid down by commissioners respectively appointed for the purpose."

2. His Catholic Majesty to ratify the convention of 1802, and both Governments to abide by the decision of the joint commission on the question of indemnities, classing as such those which regard American citizens and the Crown and subjects of His Catholic Majesty, for spoiliations reciprocally committed to the period of the said convention, and thereafter, to the date of the confirmation of the adjustment by the joint commission. Five or seven members to compose the commission, with this condition, that if they are five, each Government shall respectively nominate a person for the fifth member, to be chosen by lot, provided they cannot agree on the person to be so chosen; the same to take place for the fifth, sixth, and seventh, if there be seven members; but the fifth, in the first instance, and the fifth, sixth, and seventh, in the second, shall neither be Spaniards nor citizens of the United States by birth or naturalization. They shall moreover be, by their profession and office, judges, of the number of those subjects who, among maritime and commercial nations, are usually employed to judge and decide on matters connected with maritime law and the law of nations, whether in France, England, Russia, Austria, or the Netherlands; in both cases, the person so designated to be provided with a certificate of the Government of the country he belongs to, proving the opinion entertained of his integrity and capacity, his quality and actual profession as a judge in the matters referred to, and also the assurance that permission shall be granted to him for discharging the duties of the commission, in case the said person shall be chosen by lot.

With these modifications, suggested by prudence, impartiality, and the most perfect rectitude, and excluding, as is just, the indemnity for the spoiliations committed on the commerce of this Republic by French privateers and consuls on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, and by the tribunals of cassation in France, the convention of 1802 to be ratified and carried into execution.

3. His Catholic Majesty to unite with the United States in using their best endeavors to obtain from France the correspondent indemnity for the spoiliations just mentioned, in case that question has not already been settled between the French and American Governments.

4. The Government of the United States to engage to take effectual measures to prevent all hostile armaments in their ports and territory against the commerce and possessions of Spain, either by Americans or any other Power, or by adventurers of any other nations, or by the rebels of Spanish America; and, for their due execution, the President to issue positive orders to all persons employed by the Government, charging them, on their responsibility, to guard against any infraction or violation of them whatsoever, extending the same measures to the preventing of any vessels employed in cruising against the Spanish commerce, or otherwise hostilely engaged against the Government and subjects of His Catholic Majesty, from arming in, or entering armed, the harbors and waters of the United States. Every vessel of this description found within the jurisdiction of the United States to be seized without remission, and subjected to the rigor of the law by the American officers and authorities; and the vessels and property so captured, belonging to the subjects of the Crown of Spain, to be laid under attachment, and definitively delivered up to His Majesty's Minister, or the nearest Spanish Consul, to be held by them at the disposal of the lawful owners. This proposal contains nothing beyond the obligations already imposed by the laws of the United States, the law of nations, and the existing treaty. But as it is evident to you, and to the whole world, that abuses and infractions of these laws and solemn compacts have been, and continue to be, frequently practised, it is absolutely necessary that suitable measures be adopted, fully and effectually to prevent the repetition of similar abuses and infractions.

By these four proposals the rights and interests of both Powers are reconciled upon principles of manifest justice and reciprocal utility; they settle and terminate all pending differences, in my judgment, satisfactorily to both nations; and I must presume that the President will view them in the same light, and substantially admit them. In case there be any other question of secondary or minor importance to be in like manner included in the general and definitive adjustment, it will be easy, and follow of course, after we have agreed on the most essential articles or points; we will then also determine the true import of the several propositions laid down,

If, however, you should find any difficulty or obstacle to the acceptance of the proposals I have now the honor to make to you, and are of opinion that by any other mode we may attain the desired object, without deviating from the fundamental principles and basis of justice and reciprocal convenience, I will, with great pleasure, be ready to adopt it, provided it be compatible with the powers given me by the King, my master. In this view you can propose such changes or modifications as you may see fit, as are calculated to remove all difficulties on both sides, and reconcile the rights, interests, and wishes of both Powers.

In the meantime, I hope that the course pursued by the President (en la marcha de su conducta) will correspond with the sentiments and uniform profession of amity and perfect harmony existing between His Majesty and the United States; and I am, therefore, constrained to reclaim and protest, formally, as I now do, against all measures whatsoever injurious to the rights of the Crown of Spain, and to renew, as I hereby do, the protest already made against the occupation of Amelia Island, and against the orders to occupy Galveston, inasmuch as the United States having no right whatever either to the said island or to Galveston, they neither had, nor could have, a just motive or cause to sanction similar acts of violence in the midst of peace.

I await your answer to this note in order that we may accelerate the moment of agreeing on just and fit measures for carrying the definitive settlement of all pending differences into effect.

In the meantime, I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my constant respect.

God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The same to the same.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1818.

SIR: The multiplicity of business which I believe has, and still does engage your attention, from the necessity of preparing and laying before the Congress the papers and information called for on different subjects, must assuredly have prevented you from replying as yet to my note of the 24th of last month; it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to trouble you, by trespassing on your attention, to urge the importance of your answer, as I feel assured you are as fully aware of it as I am. But the earnest wish I have to accelerate the negotiation that has been opened, and thereby to come to a final settlement of the differences pending between His Catholic Majesty's Government and yours, impels me to take this step. I therefore request you, sir, to be pleased to inform me, as soon as you possibly can, whether the proposals offered in my aforesaid note come up to or approach the wishes of this Republic, and if, with the view of satisfying them, you can devise another just mode calculated to reconcile the rights of both nations upon some principle of reciprocal utility and convenience, I hope you will communicate it to me, in full confidence that I shall not hesitate a moment to accede to any modification or expedient founded on a basis of acknowledged justice and mutual utility, because it is to such a basis that all the instructions and powers I have received from my Sovereign refer.

The United States having manifested a wish to obtain the Floridas, His Catholic Majesty has condescended to accede thereto, as a proof of his friendship and high consideration for the United States, and has authorized me to stipulate the cession of those two provinces for an equivalent of territory westward of the Mississippi. Having proved on the part of His Majesty's Government, by the most complete evidence of which moral facts are susceptible, and by a conviction in nowise inferior to that of mathematical truths, that the proper boundaries of Louisiana, eastward of the Mississippi, are defined by the course of that river, and thence by the Iberville and the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain; and that to the westward they never did nor could extend beyond the rivers Carcass and Mermonto, or Mermonto, running between Natchitoches and Adaes, across Red river, and thence northward to a line not yet fixed, and to be settled by commissioners to be appointed by both Governments, it is clear that the proposals offered in my note for the final settlement of the question of boundaries cannot fail to appear advantageous to your Government, and satisfactory to the just wishes of the United States. But if, for their greater satisfaction, you can point out an expedient by which the said proposals may be still further modified, without detracting from the acknowledged principles of common justice and reciprocal convenience, I am ready to attend to and stipulate it immediately, if it come within the sphere of my powers and instructions; and in case it should not, by presenting, perchance, combinations which could not be foreseen by His Catholic Majesty, I will immediately despatch a courier to Madrid, to inform my Government of the demands of yours, and request more ample powers adapted to them.

The question of indemnities can be attended with no difficulty. The Spanish Government has always been willing to give due satisfaction for the losses and injuries sustained by citizens of this Republic, and committed by Spaniards, contrary to the law of nations and the existing treaty; but it cannot relinquish its claim to comprehend, in like manner, in the adjustment of those losses and injuries, such as have been committed by citizens and authorities of this Republic on the Crown and subjects of Spain, in violation of the same right and treaty. Your Government, sensible of the justice of this demand, cannot fail to accede to it; thus by ratifying the convention agreed on in 1802, as I have already proposed to you, the question of indemnities will be easily settled and determined.

The King, my master, being desirous of giving the United States and the whole world incontestable proofs of the rectitude and sincerity of his dispositions, and of his love of justice and good faith, is ready to submit all the questions embraced by the pending differences to the arbitration of one or more of the Powers of Europe in whom the United States may have the greatest confidence, they and His Majesty respectively engaging to abide irrevocably by the decision of such arbitration. In cases where justice alone is sought for, this reference must be particularly desirable, and has been frequently resorted to, as well by individuals as by the most respectable nations, on controverted questions.

The British Government, on being informed of the difficulties attending the negotiation pending between Spain and the United States, made an offer of its mediation for the purpose of reconciling them, and the President has not been pleased to accept it, as I have been lately informed by the Minister of England to these States. From this refusal I am to infer that the President is willing, on his part, to remove all the obstacles which oppose the prompt and happy termination of the negotiation pending; and, under this impression, which is due to the uprightness, rectitude, and good faith of the American Government, I flatter myself that it will not be necessary to have recourse to the mediation or arbitration of friendly or neutral Powers to settle and terminate on principles of justice the existing differences between the United States and Spain; and if unfortunately this should not be the case, I also flatter myself that your Government will approve of one of those modes, as being dictated by a sincere love of peace and justice due to such occasions.

I therefore hope, sir, that you will reply as soon as possible to the proposals made in my last note, and communicate to me whatever you may think most conducive to the happy termination of the pending negotiation, and still further to strengthen the bonds of friendship and good understanding between the two nations.

In the mean while, I have the honor to renew to you the assurances of my respect, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

MARCH 12, 1818.

SIR: The admission, in your letter of the 24th of January, that all the facts, grounds, and arguments, alleged in your previous notes of 29th of December and of the 5th and 8th of January, in support of the pretensions of your Government upon the several points of difference which have so long subsisted between the United States and Spain, are essentially the same as had already been advanced and discussed at the period of the extraordinary mission to Spain in 1805, while it justifies the reluctance, on the part of the American Government, manifested in my letter of the 16th of January, to the renewal of an exhausted discussion, cannot but excite some surprise, as comporting so little with the professions of the earnest desire of your Government to bring those differences to a speedy and happy termination which have been so strongly and so repeatedly expressed as well in your notes as in the recent communications from Don Francisco Pizarro to the Minister of the United States at Madrid. The observation, that truth is of all times, and that reason and justice are founded upon immutable principles, has never been contested by the United States; but neither truth, reason, nor justice consists in stubbornness of assertion, nor in the multiplied repetition of error. I referred you to the letters from the extraordinary mission of 1805 to Don Pedro Cevallos, for an ample and satisfactory refutation of the supposed facts, grounds, and arguments now reproduced by you. You reply by telling me that "there does not appear to be a single incident to give the smallest support to the pretensions of my Government; that all the vague positions on which it has been attempted to found them have been refuted and dissipated by the Spanish Government, by a demonstration so luminous and convincing as to leave no alternative to reason to resist it." And you, more than once, intimate that the American Government does not itself believe in the validity of the statements and arguments used by its Ministers in support of the claims of the United States, as asserted by them.

To language and sentiments such as these the Government of the United States cannot reply; nor can it, without an effort, continue at all a discussion sullied by such unworthy and groundless imputations.

I am directed by the President to confine the observations upon your late notes to those parts of them which have relation to the essential subjects of controversy between the two nations.

To give a single instance of that course of argument which you represent as equivalent to mathematical demonstration in favor of Spain, it will be sufficient to refer to your assertions in relation to the question of the eastern boundaries of Louisiana, as retroceded to France by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso in 1800, and ceded by France to the United States in 1803. The claim of the United States, under that cession, to the territory east of the Mississippi, as far as the river Perdido, rests, as you well know, upon the words in the two treaties describing the colony or province of Louisiana ceded by them, as having the same extent, not only that it had at the time of the retrocession in the hands of Spain, but also that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States. You know also with what force it was urged by the Ministers of the United States at Aranjuez, in 1805, that those words (referring to the primitive possession of the province by France) could have had no other meaning than that of extending the retrocession to the Perdido, because the province had always had that extent when in the possession of France. And what is your reply to this argument, which you are pleased to include under the general censure of vague and groundless positions? It is no other than a supposition of a treaty of 1764, by virtue of which, you say, France ceded the western remnant of Louisiana to Spain a year after having ceded the eastern part of it, from the Mississippi to the Perdido, to England. With the aid of this treaty you are enabled, first, to discover an interval of time between the two cessions, and during which France possessed Louisiana, bounded eastward by the Mississippi; and, secondly, to include this treaty between Spain and France among those described in the article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, as "the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States."

There is reason to believe that no such treaty of 1764 ever existed. That the cessions of Louisiana, westward of the Mississippi, to Spain, and eastward of that river to the Perdido, to England, were made by France both on the 3d of November, 1762, is certain; and that the acceptance by the King of Spain of the cession made to him took place on the 13th of the same November, 1762; the proof of which is in the very order from the King of France to L'Abbadie, for the delivery of the province to the officers of the King of Spain. The province had never belonged to France a single day, without extending to the Perdido. Nor can it be necessary to remind you that the very treaty of cession, by which France surrendered her possession of Louisiana to Spain, cannot be comprehended in the description of treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.

As this simple reference to a notorious and unquestionable fact annihilates all that course of reasoning upon which your understanding rejects all doubt, so a recurrence to another fact, equally notorious, replies as decisively to your appeal to the treaty of 6th February, 1778, between the United States and France. You say that in the year 1800 France could not have acquired any territory east of the Mississippi, without a monstrous violation of that treaty; forgetting that that treaty, and all its obligations upon France, had, before the year 1800, ceased to exist.

The fact that the cessions of the two parts of Louisiana to Spain and England were made on the same day, may serve no less as a reply to all the verbal criticisms so gravely urged by Mr. Cevallos, and now repeated by you, on the force of the terms retrocede and retrocession, used in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. The plain import of the words is neither more or less than giving back, restoring. It does not, and cannot be made to imply that both the parties to the restoration must, of necessity, be the same as both the parties to the grant. They only imply that the object and the party granting, and the party receiving it, as restored, are the same. To use an illustration from the concerns of individual life, suppose A, by two separate deeds, grants half an acre of land to B, and the other half to C. B, by subsequent purchase, obtains the half acre granted to C, and then regrants the whole acre back to A. By whatever denomination the two half acres may have been called, in the interval between the first grant and the restoration, B might, with the most perfect propriety, be said to retrocede the whole; and if in the act of restoration the acre should be called by the same name, and expressly described as having the same extent as when it had been first owned by A, with what shadow of justice could B pretend that his regrant was only of the half acre he had first received from A, because the other half acre had, in the interval, been called by another name, and for some time owned by another person? That the term retrocession is in common use in this sense, take the following passage from the English translation of Alcedo's Dictionary:

"By a treaty in 1783, Great Britain retroceded to Spain all the territory which both Spain and France had ceded to Great Britain in 1763."

There would then be nothing in the terms retrocede and retrocession which could limit the territories restored by Spain to the boundaries under which she had first received part of them from France, even if the original cessions of the two parts had been made at different times, and even if those words, "with the same extent it had when in the hands of France," had not been inserted in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. But when it is considered that the cessions by France of the two parts of Louisiana were made to Spain and to England on the same day; when we know that the cession of the part ceded to England had been made for the benefit of Spain, as it was an equivalent for the restoration by England of the island of Cuba to Spain; and when we seek for any possible meaning to the words referring to the extent of Louisiana when before owned by France, to our minds, sir, the conclusion is irresistible that the terms retrocede and retrocession can have, in this case, no other meaning than that for which we contend, and that they include the giving back to France the whole of Louisiana which had ever belonged to France, and which it was, at the time of the signature of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, in the power of Spain to restore.

By the words in the third article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, adopted in the treaty of cession of 1803 to the United States, Spain retrocedes to France the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it "now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." At the negotiation of Aranjuez, in 1805, your alleged treaty of 1764 never occurred to the imagination of Mr. Cevallos as one of these subsequent treaties; for, after citing this clause of the article, he says, in his letter to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe, of the 24th February, 1805: "the treaties here alluded to are not, nor can be, others than those of 1783, between Spain and England, and 1795, between Spain and the United States." The American Ministers, in their answer of the 8th March, 1805, explicitly agree in opinion with Mr. Cevallos on this point; and your intimation of a treaty of 1764, to which you suppose the clause also to apply, is as incompatible with the pretensions of your own Government in 1805, as with those of the United States at this day.

To account for the peculiar phraseology used in this description, inserted in the third article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, we must advert to the peculiar situation of the territory to be conveyed, and to what must have been the intention of the parties. It was a colony or province to be restored; and therefore the object of France could have been no other than to obtain the restoration of the whole original colony, so far as it was in the power of Spain to restore it. But there was a part of the original colony which had been ceded by France to England, which had in process of time become a part of the United States, and which, not being in the hands of Spain, she could not restore: there was another part which had been ceded by France directly to Spain, which still remained in her hands, but subject to certain conditions stipulated by Spain in a treaty with the United States; and there was a third part, which France had ceded to England in 1762, but which had afterwards fallen into the hands of Spain, and which she was equally competent to restore, as if it had been ceded by France to herself. As the boundaries of this colony or province never had been precisely defined, and had been, from its first settlement, a subject of dispute between France and Spain, the parties had no means of recurring to any former definition of boundaries to carry their intention into effect; as they had no geographical lines or landmarks to which they now recur, they assumed their definition from circumstances incidental to the present and past time. If the intention had been to cede back the province only with the extent it actually had in the hands of Spain, the parties would have said so, and omitted the other clause, which, in that case, would have been not merely superfluous, but tending to perplex that which would have been clear without it. If it had been intended that Spain should restore to France only what she had received from France, nothing could have been more clear and easy than to have said so; but then, the reference to the extent of the colony when France possessed it would have been not merely absurd, but contradictory to that intention. The very use of both the terms province and colony shows that the parties were looking to the original state, as well as to the actual condition of the territory to be restored. Louisiana, the actual Spanish province, was one thing, and Louisiana, the original French colony, was another; the adoption of both the words is of itself a strong presumption that the intention was to restore not only the actual province, but so much of any other province as was then in the hands of Spain, and had formed part of the original French colony.

Assume the intention of the parties to have been that for which we contend, and under the existing circumstances they could scarcely have expressed it by any other words than those which are found in the article—assume that they had any other intention, and you can find no rational meaning for their words. The province was to be restored, with the extent it actually had in the hands of Spain; the colony was to be restored, with the extent it had when formerly possessed by France. Spain could not restore the parts of the original colony which were not in her actual possession, and which already formed parts of the Western States and Territories of this Union; but she could restore that part of the colony of which she had become possessed by a treaty of 1783 with Great Britain. Mr. Cevallos urged, with some earnestness, that the first clause having marked the extent of the colony or province, such "as it then had in the hands of Spain," it would be inconsistent and absurd to suppose that the words "and that it had when France possessed it" could be intended to mark a greater extent, because it would be saying, in one breath, that the cession was of the same extent, and of more than the same extent, that it had in the possession of Spain. But there is no absurdity or inconsistency in modifying, by one clause of a definition, an extent described in another clause of the same definition; no more than, in the description of a surface, the line in breadth is inconsistent with the line in length. According to this argument of Mr. Cevallos, the words "and that it had when France possessed it" had no meaning at all; they merely repeated what had been fully and completely expressed by the preceding clause; but if they had no meaning, what possible motive could the parties have for inserting them, when it must have been perfectly familiar to the memory of both that the extent of the province or colony, when in the hands of France, had included West Florida to the Perdido, which territory was also then in the actual possession of Spain? If it were possible to suppose that the Ministers of France and Spain, in the very article defining the extent of the country to be conveyed, could have been so careless as to admit an idle waste of words, the very composition of this article carries internal evidence with it that no such improvidence is imputable to those by whom it was drawn up. The reference to the extent of the colony in the primitive possession of France could not be to a time when the property of it had been no longer hers. It could not be to say over again what had been said in the immediately preceding clause. Every word of the description carries with it evidence of deep deliberation and significance. The first clause marks the intention of the parties, by the incident of actual possession by Spain, all of which was to be restored; the second clause modifies by enlarging the extent, from the incident of original possession by France; and the third clause modifies, by restricting the grant to the conditions which Spain had stipulated concerning the territory of other States. Altogether, the clear and explicit meaning of the whole article is, that Spain should restore to France as much of old French Louisiana as she had to restore, but under such restrictions as the engagements contracted by Spain with other Powers required of her good faith to secure.

Let us pass to the consideration of the western boundaries of Louisiana.

With the note of Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, to Don Pedro Cevallos, of the 28th January, 1805, a memoir upon these boundaries was presented to that Minister, proving that they extended eastward to the Perdido, and westward to the Rio Bravo, or Grande del Norte. They observed in that note that "the facts and principles which justify this conclusion are so satisfactory to their Government as to convince it that the United States have not a better right to the island of New Orleans, under the cession referred to, than they have to the whole district of territory thus described."

In their note of the 20th of April, 1805, to the same Minister, replying to his argument in support of the pretensions of your Government with regard to those limits, they lay down and establish by a chain of reasoning which neither Mr. Cevallos at the time nor your Government at any period since has ever attempted to break, three principles, sanctioned alike by immutable justice and the general practice of the European nations which have formed settlements and held possessions in this hemisphere; and by the application of which to the facts also stated in their note this question of the western boundary ought then to have been and eventually must be settled. These principles were—

First. "That, when any European nation takes possession of any extent of seacoast, that possession is understood as extending to the interior country, to the sources of the rivers emptying within that coast, to all their branches and the country they cover, and to give it a right in exclusion of all other nations to the same."

Secondly. "That, whenever one European nation makes a discovery, and takes possession of any portion of this continent, and another afterwards does the same at some distance from it, where the boundary between them is not determined by the principle above mentioned, the middle distance becomes such of course."

Thirdly. "That, whenever any European nation has thus acquired a right to any portion of territory on this continent, that right can never be diminished or affected by any other Power, by virtue of purchases made, by grants or conquests of the natives within the limits thereof."

The facts stated in this last-mentioned note, and to which these principles were applied in support of the claim of the United States, under the cession of Louisiana by France to them, were—

1. That the Mississippi, in its whole length to the ocean, was discovered by French subjects from Canada, in 1683.

2. That La Salle, a Frenchman, with a commission and authority from Louis XIV., discovered the bay of St. Bernard, and formed a settlement there on the western side of the river Colorado, in the year 1685, and that the possession thus taken in the bay of St. Bernard, in connexion with that on the Mississippi, had always been understood, as of right it ought, to extend to the Rio Bravo.

3. That the boundary, thus founded upon possession, was described as forming the limits of Louisiana, in the grant by Louis XIV. to Crozat, in 1712.

4. That it was supported by the testimony of the historical writers, Du Pratz and Champigny; by an historical and political memoir on Louisiana, written by the Count de Vergennes, the Minister of Louis XVI.; by a chart of Louisiana, published in 1762, by Don Thomas Lopez, geographer to the King of Spain; and by a map of De Lisle, of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, revised and republished there in 1782.

To these principles, thus clear, equitable, and explicit; to these facts, thus precise, authentic, and unsophisticated, what was opposed by Don Pedro Cevallos at that time, and what is now alleged by you?

Mr. Cevallos began by admitting that the western limits of Louisiana had never been exactly fixed; and alleged that, in the year 1690, five or six years after the possession taken, and the settlement formed by La Salle, Captain Alonzo de Leon, under a commission from the Viceroy of Mexico, examined the Bay of Espiritu Santo, (St. Bernard,) took possession of the territory, and founded the mission of St. Francisco de Texas. Mr. Cevallos asserted that it would be very easy to make it appear that France never had claimed this extent for Louisiana, but he did not make it appear. He also said that, if France had claimed it, Spain had never recognised, and was not bound to acknowledge the claim.

Mr. Cevallos said that the limits between Louisiana and the Texas had always been known, even when the French possessed Louisiana, but he had just before acknowledged that they had never been fixed. He spoke of missions founded near the beginning of the last century by the venerable Margel, of the order of St. Francisco; he alluded to plans, and documents, and historical relations which were not to be found in his department, but many of which, he added, were in the department of the interior, besides those which were in the Viceroyalty of Mexico. But he never pretended a possession, by Spain, of the territories in question, of an earlier date than 1690.

And what are these plans, and documents, and historical relations, which, after the lapse of thirteen years, you have drawn forth from all the archives of Spain, and all the historical disquisitions upon the discovery and conquest of the new world? Is it to that catalogue, biographical, and geographical, of Spanish adventurers, and of the numberless regions explored by them in the 16th century, which swells your note of the 5th of January, that we are to look for the limits of Louisiana and Texas? Or is it to that "royal order issued by Philip II., enjoining the extermination of all foreigners who would dare to penetrate into the Gulf of Mexico," by virtue of which the Viceroy fitted out the expedition to scour the country and hunt out the French of La Salle's settlement? Is it to that royal order that you appeal for proof of the prior title of Spain? It is even so. But as the voyages of Ponce de Leon in 1511, of Francisco de Garay in 1518, and of Hernando de Soto in 1538, have no more bearing upon this question than the voyages of Christopher Columbus and Sebastian Cabot, so you must be sensible that the royal exterminating order of Philip II., if it proved anything, would prove fatal to the whole province or colony of Louisiana. If that order could have been carried into execution, no such colony as that of Louisiana could ever have been established by France. That order, and any proceeding of the Viceroy of Mexico under it, can no more affect the right of the United States to the limits marked by the settlement of La Salle, than it can impair their title to the island of New Orleans. Far more honorable would it be, sir, to the character of your nation and the credit of your Government, to bury in the profoundest oblivion the memory of that atrocious order, than at this day to produce it for the purpose of bolstering up a title for which you have in vain ransacked the records of the Spanish monarchy to discover a better support.

To the efficacy, however, of this royal order, your whole argument, in behalf of the pretensions of your Government, perpetually recurs; for, although in some passages of your note you appear disposed to allow to the colony of Louisiana at least the eastern banks of the Mississippi, yet you are as frequently shrinking even from this concession, and representing the whole colony as an encroachment upon the dominion of Spain; at one time representing it as a profound stratagem of Louis XIV., seizing with rapacious avidity the unsuspecting moment of confidence of his grandson Philip V., while placing him upon the Throne of Spain; and, at another, holding it up as the act of a disordered imagination of the same Louis XIV., manifested in the grant of 1712 to Crozat. This grant you pronounce to be absurd and completely despicable; but for what reason it is not easy to conjecture. It certainly does not favor the pretensions of your Government, and it has none of the exterminating features of the royal order of Philip II.; but we consider it, as it has always been considered by the world, as a document not only indicative of sound judgment and discretion, but as marking the limits of Louisiana, as always claimed by France, and transferred, as relates to the western limits, with her title to that province, to the United States.

It is remarkable that, in imitation of Mr. Cevallos, you also, after repeatedly insisting that the boundaries of Louisiana were well known, and always acknowledged by France, finally conclude by admitting that they never were fixed or agreed upon. You repeat, time after time, that the French never disputed the right of Spain to all the territory westward of the Mississippi, while you cannot deny the settlement of La Salle at the bay of St. Bernard, in 1684; nor that the French settlements of Natchez and Natchitoches were made and maintained in spite of all the military expeditions, rigorous executions, and exterminating orders which the Viceroy of Mexico could send against them.

We may admit that, so long as the Spanish Viceroy could exterminate every foreigner who dared to penetrate into the Gulf of Mexico, they had the royal order of Philip II. for so doing. The bull of Pope Alexander VI. is a document of still earlier date, and at least of less disgusting import, upon which Spain once rested her claims to yet more extensive dominion in this western world. With equal show of reason, and with less outrage upon the rights of humanity, might you have alleged that bull as the incontrovertible proof of the Spanish claims, as to bring forth at this day, for its only substitute, that royal order of Philip II.

You know, sir, and your own notes furnish, themselves, the most decisive proofs that France, while she held the colony of Louisiana, never did acknowledge the Mississippi as the western boundary of that province. The claim of France always did extend westward to the Rio Bravo; and the only boundaries ever acknowledged by her, before the cession to Spain of November 3, 1762, were those marked out in the grant from Louis XIV. to Crozat. She always claimed the territory which you call Texas as being within the limits and forming part of Louisiana, which in that grant, is declared to be bounded westward by New Mexico, eastward by Carolina, and extending inward to the Illinois and to the sources of the Mississippi and of its principal branches.

Mr. Cevallos says that these claims of France were never admitted nor recognised by Spain. Be it so. Neither were the claims of Spain ever acknowledged or admitted by France; the boundary was disputed and never settled; it still remains to be settled; and here is a simple statement of the grounds alleged by each of the parties in support of their claims:

On the part of the United States.

1. The discovery of the Mississippi, from near its source to the ocean, by the French from Canada, in 1683.
2. The possession taken, and establishment made, by La Salle, at the bay of St. Bernard, west of the rivers Trinity and Colorado, by authority from Louis XIV., in 1685.
3. The charter of Louis XIV. to Crozat, in 1712.
4. The historical authority of Du Pratz and of the Count de Vergennes.
5. The geographical authority of De Lisle's map, and especially that of the map of Don Thomas Lopez, Geographer to the King of Spain, published in 1762.

These documents were all referred to in the letter from Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos, of 20th of April, 1805. Since which time, and in further confirmation of the same claims, the Government of the United States are enabled to refer you to the following:

6. A map published by Homann, at Nuremberg, in 1712.

7. A geographical work, published in 1717 at London, entitled "Atlas Geographicus, or a Complete System of Geography, Ancient and Modern," in which the map of Louisiana marks its extent from the Rio Bravo to the Perdido. In both these maps the fort built by La Salle is laid down on the spot now called Matagorda.

8. An official British map, published in 1755, by Bowen, intended to point out the boundaries of the British, Spanish, and French colonies in North America.

9. The narratives published at Paris, of Hennepin, in 1683; of Tonti, in 1697; and of Joutel, in 1713.

10. The letter from Colonel La Harpe to Don Martin D'Alarconne, of 8th July, 1719. (A. No. 1. B. No. 2.)

11. The order from the French Governor of Louisiana, Bienville, to La Harpe, of August 10, 1721. (C. No. 3.)

12. The geographical work of Don Antonio de Alcedo, a Spanish geographer of the highest eminence. This work and the map of Lopez, having been published after the cession of Louisiana to Spain, in 1762, afford decisive evidence of what Spain herself considered as the western boundary of Louisiana, when she had no interest in contesting it against another State. (D. No. 4.)

On the part of Spain.

1. The voyages of Ponce de Leon, Vasquez de Ayllon, Panfilo de Narvaez, Hernando de Soto, Luis Moscoso, and other Spanish travellers in the sixteenth century, who never made any settlement upon any of the territories in question, but who travelled, as you observed, into countries too tedious to enumerate.

2. The establishment of the new kingdoms of Leon and Santander in 1595, and the Province of Coahuila in 1600.

3. The Province of Texas, founded in 1690. Here, you will please to observe, begins the conflict with the claims of France to the western boundary of Louisiana, transferred by the cession of the province to the United States. The presidios, or settlements of Las Texas, were, by your own statement, adverse settlements to that of La Salle, who, six years before, had taken formal possession of the country in the name of and by authority of a charter from Louis XIV. They were preceded by an expedition from Mexico the year before, (that is, 1689,) to hunt out the French remaining of the settlement of La Salle. Now, what right had the Viceroy of Mexico to hunt out the French who had formed a settlement under the sanction of their Sovereign's authority? You will tell me that, from the time when Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico, was built, Spain considered all the territory east and north of that province, as far as the Mississippi and the Missouri, as her property; that the whole circumference of the Gulf of Mexico was hers; and that Philip II. had issued a royal order to exterminate every foreigner who should dare to penetrate to it; so that the whole question of right between the United States and Spain, with regard to this boundary, centres in this: the naked pretension of Spain to the whole circumference of the Gulf of Mexico, with the exterminating order of Philip II. on one side, and the actual occupancy of France, by a solemn charter from Louis XIV. on the other. Well might Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe write to Mr. Cevallos, in 1805, that the claim of the United States to the boundary of the Rio Bravo was as clear as their right to the island of New Orleans.

In the letter of Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos of the twentieth of April, 1805, referring to the historical documents relative to the discovery and naming of Louisiana, they state that the Mississippi was discovered, with "its waters and dependent country as low down the river as the Arkansas, by the Sieurs Joliet and Marquette, from Canada, as early as the year 1673, and to its mouth by the Father Hennepin, in 1680; and by De la Salle and Tonti, who descended the river with sixty men to the ocean, and called the country Louisiana, in 1682; and, in respect to the bay of St. Bernard, in 1685;" that this was done at these periods, in the name and under the authority of France, by acts which proclaimed her sovereignty over the whole country to other Powers, in a manner the most public and solemn, such as making settlements and building forts within it."

To this, Mr. Cevallos made no reply in 1805. But you, after giving an account of the murder by Spaniards of René de Laudonnière, observe, that "the story related of a Recollet friar, called Father Hennepin, is still more ridiculous, who is said to have been made a prisoner by the Indians at the time they were at war with the French of Canada, and taken to the Illinois, whence he was occupied in exploring the country as far as the banks of the river St. Louis, or Mississippi, of which he took possession in the name of Louis XIV., and gave it the name of Louisiana, (doubtless in his secret thoughts, and by a mere mental act.)" You add that these accounts, and others of the like nature, are "contemptible in themselves, even although the facts they relate were authentic; since nothing can be inferred from them that can favor the idea started by those who speak of those transient adventures and incursions."

I have, in my possession, sir, (and it shall, when you please, be subject to your inspection,) a volume, published at Paris in the year 1683, the title of which is, "Description de la Louisiane, nouvellement découverte, au Sudouest de la Nouvelle France, par ordre du Roy, dédiée à Sa Majesté; par le R. P. Louis Hennepin, Missionnaire Recollet et Notaire Apostolique." (Description of Louisiana, recently discovered, to the southwest of New France, by order of the King; dedicated to His Majesty by the Rev. Father Louis Hennepin, a Recollet missionary and apostolic notary.) In the preface to the King, the author says: "Sire, I should never have dared to take the liberty of offering to your Majesty the narrative of a new discovery, which the Sieur de la Salle, governor of Fort Frontenac, my companions, and myself, have just made to the southwest of New France, if it had not been undertaken by your orders." "We have given the name of Louisiana to this great discovery, being persuaded that your Majesty would not disapprove that a part of the earth, watered by a river of more than eight hundred leagues, and much greater than Europe, which may be called the delight of America, and which is capable of forming a great empire, should henceforth be known by the august name of Louis, that it may thereby have a sort of right to your protection, and hope for the advantage of belonging to you."

Now, sir, permit me to request you to compare this authentic statement with that perversion of all historical evidence by which you have styled and have attempted to make the story of Father Hennepin's discovery of Louisiana ridiculous. Here is a book published at Paris, dedicated to Louis XIV., at the most glorious period of his reign, declaring to the world the discovery of Louisiana; declaring that it was made by his orders, and called by his name, for the express purpose of entitling it to become his property. Is this contemptible? Is this a secret thought, or a mere mental act? Is this a transient adventure or incursion? And, after calling this information too vague and uncertain upon which to found a title, can you talk of the rights of possession derived to Spain from the travels of Ponce de Leon, Francisco de Garay, and Vasquez de Ayllon?

Your view of the expeditions and adventures of La Salle is equally remote from the real and well-authenticated facts. "Let us see," you say, "what importance can be attached to what is said of Bernard [Robert] de la Salle, who, in 1679, descended from Canada to the Mississippi, and there built Fort Crèvecoeur, according to M. Du Pratz, or Fort Prud'homme, according to others. What is certain amounts to this: that he only made a rapid incursion from Canada to the Mississippi, as any other adventurer might do, crossing the territories of another nation, that he returned to Quebec, without any further result than that of an imperfect exploration of the country; and that he embarked at Quebec for France, from whence he returned in 1684, with an expedition composed of four vessels, commanded by Captain Beaujeau, to explore the mouth of the Mississippi," &c. In this passage you represent—

1. The facts attending the expedition of La Salle as uncertain.
2. That he only made a rapid incursion, as a private adventurer, and, so far as related to his exploring expedition, with an imperfect result.
3. That he only went from Canada to the Mississippi, and thence returned to Quebec, whence he embarked for France.
4. That he only crossed the territories of another nation, (meaning Spain.)

I examine this part of your note with a minuteness which will be tedious to you, because it is precisely upon the character of La Salle's expeditions that the grant of Louisiana to Crozat by Louis XIV. is, in express terms, founded; because you have represented these expeditions in the colors thus marked with the avowed purpose of weakening the original title of Louisiana; and because you know that the characters, diametrically opposite, which I shall now prove to have belonged to them, must lead to the result of an incontestable title in France, and, consequently, at this time, in the United States. I answer the above insinuations in the order in which they have been stated.

There are three narratives of the expeditions of La Salle, all published at Paris, by persons who accompanied him in them.

The first in 1683, by Father Louis Hennepin; the same volume from which I have already presented you an extract.

The second by the Chevalier Tonti, Governor of Fort St. Louis, at the Illinois, published in 1697.

The third by Joutel, who was with him in his last expedition, and almost by his side when he fell by the hands of an assassin.

Of all the heroic enterprises which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, signalized the discoveries of Europeans upon this continent, there is not one of which the evidence is more certain, authentic, and particular, than those of La Salle.

La Salle, after having resided many years in Canada, as Governor of Fort Frontenac, formed the project of exploring the country from thence to the Gulf of Mexico, and of taking possession of it in the name of his Sovereign. He went to France for the purpose of obtaining the sanction to his enterprise. "His Majesty," (says Tonti,) not content with merely approving his design, caused orders to be given to him, granting him permission to go and put it in execution; and, to assist him to carry so vast a project into effect, shortly after the necessary succors were furnished him, with entire liberty to dispose of all the countries which he might discover."

He sailed from La Rochelle the 14th of July, 1678, and arrived at Quebec the 15th of September. On the 18th of November of the same year he left Fort Frontenac, to proceed upon his expedition, with thirty men, Tonti and Father Hennepin being of the company. After spending more than a year in traversing the four lakes, now known by the names of Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Michigan, and erecting forts at suitable places, where he landed, from them he embarked upon the Illinois river, and, having descended it for some distance, was obliged to stop, from the disappointment of losing a boat from which he expected supplies. Here, upon the Illinois river, he built Fort Crèvecoeur, divided his company into two separate parties—one for ascending the Mississippi to its source, and the other for proceeding down that river. Father Hennepin was of the former of these parties, and in their progress upwards, which they accomplished higher than the falls of St. Anthony, was taken prisoner by the Indians, and, after some time, was released by them, found his way back to Quebec, and thence returned to France, and published the book of which I have spoken. In this book, published in 1683, at Paris, and marked as having been finished printing the 5th of January of that year, three months before La Salle had reached the mouth of the Mississippi, there is a map of the river as far down as Hennepin descended it, after he parted from La Salle, and upwards to the falls of St. Anthony, and the river St. Francis above them; at some distance above which, within a few leagues of its source, is the oak tree upon which the arms of France were carved by the detachment from La Salle's expedition, authenticating, with the most minute precision, the discovery of the Mississippi, to within a small distance of its source, as well as its course to the Gulf of Mexico. On the same map are also marked the fort at the Miamies, and that of Crèvecoeur, on the Illinois river, constructed by La Salle's orders.

In the meanwhile La Salle was obliged to leave the other part of his company, under the command of Tonti, and go back to Fort Frontenac for the supplies and reinforcements which had failed him by the loss of his boat. He returned and joined them again in November, 1682, proceeded down to the Mississippi, and to the mouth of the Wabash, where they built the Fort Prud'homme, (which you have confounded with that of Crèvecoeur,) after which they continued descending and successively meeting the Cappa, Arkansas, Tensas, Abenake, Tacucas, and Natchez Indians, and, on the 7th of April, 1683, reached the mouth of the Mississippi, where, after the religious solemnity of a Te Deum, they took formal possession of the country, erected a cross, fastened the arms of France upon a tree, and built several huts, which they surrounded with suitable intrenchments. La Salle, having thus accomplished the object of his expedition, returned by the same way, ascending the river to his fort of Prud'homme, which he reached on the 12th of May, and where he was some time detained by sickness. "On his arrival at Quebec, (again says Tonti,) he informed the whole city of his great discoveries, and of the voluntary submission of so many different Indian nations to the power of the King. A Te Deum was celebrated as a thanksgiving for this happy accession to the glory of the Crown. The eagerness of M. de la Salle to go and make known to the King and his Ministers the success of his travels obliged him to hasten his departure. He left Canada in the beginning of October, 1683." On his return to France, he was received with many marks of distinction by the King and his Ministers, and a new expedition was fitted out of four vessels and nearly three hundred persons, for the purpose of forming a colony at the mouth of the Mississippi. One of these ships was a frigate of the King, of forty guns, commanded by M. de Beaujeau, in which La Salle himself, his brother Cavelier, and the principal persons belonging to the expedition embarked; another was a smaller armed vessel, which the King had given to La Salle; the third, a flute of three hundred tons, laden with all the articles necessary for the settlement of the country; and the fourth a small sloop of thirty tons, freighted for St. Domingo, where the expedition stopped on its way, but before their arrival at which this last vessel was taken by Spanish cruisers. This expedition sailed from La Rochelle on the 24th of July, 1684.

They failed in finding the mouth of the Mississippi, their destination—an accident similar to that which had happened to the first settlers of New England; and, after many disasters, landed and built a fort in February, 1685, at the head of the bay of St. Bernard, or, as they call it, of St. Louis, and westward of the river Colorado. Beaujeu returned with the frigate to France; the two other vessels were lost in the bay; and La Salle, after several unsuccessful attempts to find the Mississippi, on the 12th of January, 1687, left at his fort twenty persons, including seven women, under the command of Le Barbier, and took his departure with sixteen others, to go by land to the Illinois, and thence through Canada to France, to seek further reinforcement and supplies. On this journey he was basely assassinated on the 19th of March, 1687, by two of his own men, and left a name among the illustrious discoverers of the new world second only to that of Columbus, with whose history and adventures his own bear in many particulars a striking resemblance. His brother Cavelier, however, with Joutel, Father Anastase, and several others of the party with whom he had commenced the journey, successfully accomplished it, arrived at the French fort at the Illinois, where they found Tonti still in command, after having again been down to the mouth of the Mississippi, conformably to his orders from La Salle, to meet the expedition from Europe, and, after waiting some time there, returning to his post. From the fort at the Illinois, Cavelier, Joutel, and Father Anastase proceeded to Quebec, and thence returned to France, where they arrived in October, 1688, and where Joutel published the narrative of the expedition to which I have referred.

From this work of Joutel it likewise appears that the fort and colony left by La Salle at the westward of the Colorado was destroyed, not as you state by the Indians, but by the Spaniards from Mexico, who, until that time, had never had any settlement of any kind nearer than Panuco, and who, by your own account, had no other right or authority for this act than the royal order of Philip II. to exterminate all foreigners penetrating into the Gulf of Mexico.

The settlements of La Salle, therefore, at the head of the bay of St. Bernard, westward of the river which he called Rivière aux Bœufs, but which you call Colorado of Texas, was not, as you have represented it, the unauthorized incursion of a private adventurer into the territories of Spain, but an establishment having every character that could sanction the formation of any European colony upon this continent; and the Viceroy of Mexico had no more right to destroy it by a military force than the present Viceroy would have to send an army and destroy the city of New Orleans. It was a part of Louisiana, discovered by La Salle, under formal and express authority from the King of France; and the royal exterminating order of Philip II. was but one of the multitude of sanguinary acts which signalized the reign and name of that monarch, while the name of La Salle is entitled to stand high in the glorious roll of the benefactors of mankind. After this statement, founded upon the most authentic documents, the foundation of the presidio of Texas, in 1693, was, by your own showing, an unlawful encroachment upon the territories of France, which, by the first of the three principles laid down by Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe at Aranjuez, and above referred to, extended on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, half-way to the nearest Spanish settlement of Panuco, namely, to the Rio Bravo.

Your "thorough investigation" of the history of the original French settlements at the Illinois and the Arkansas is as unfortunate and as wide from the facts as all the rest of your dissertation upon the history of Louisiana. The following translated extracts from the work entitled "Dernières Découvertes dans l'Amérique Septentrionale de M. de la Salle, mises au jour par M. le Chevalier de Tonti, gouverneur du Fort St. Louis, aux Illinois." (Last discoveries in North America of Mr. de la Salle, published by the Chevalier Tonti, governor of Fort St. Louis at the Illinois: Paris, 1697.) will furnish you more correct ideas upon the subject.

When La Salle left his fort, Crève-cœur, on the 8th of November, 1680, to go back to Canada for supplies, "on the third day (says Tonti) he arrived at the great village of the Illinois, where, after having observed the situation of the country, in the midst of several nations of the Miamies, Kickapoos, Ainoos, Mescontaws, and several others, watered by a beautiful river, he thought he ought to build a fort upon a height commanding the whole country, as well to make himself master of all these different tribes as to serve as a retreat and a rampart for our French people." (p. 94.) M. de la Salle, after learning that his boat was "lost, was not in the least discomposed, but wrote to me immediately, sent me with his letter the plan of the fort that he had designed; and ordered me to come and set to work upon it without delay. Tonti accordingly went, and began the building of the fort, which, from various untoward events, he was soon obliged to abandon. La Salle afterwards, before rejoining Tonti to proceed down the river, went to the new fort, and left several workmen to continue, and some soldiers to guard it. But it was upon his return from the mouth of the Mississippi, on leaving Michilimackinac, to go to France, that he gave orders to Tonti to finish the fort.

"He charged me with the duty to go and finish Fort St. Louis, of which he gave me the government, with a full power to dispose of the lands in the neighborhood, and left all his people under my command, with the exception of six Frenchmen, whom he took with him to accompany him to Quebec. We departed on the same day—he for Canada, and I for the Illinois."

Tonti accordingly finished the fort, round which a regular and rapid settlement was formed; and a new Governor in Canada having displaced him in the command of the fort, he was restored to it through the influence of La Salle, by a regular commission from the King, Louis XIV.

So much for the settlement at the Illinois. You have seen that when La Salle, in 1683, returned to France, to fit out the new expedition for the mouth of the Mississippi, he ordered Tonti, at the proper time, to go down from Fort St. Louis and meet him there. In the autumn of 1684 Tonti was informed by the Governor of Canada that La Salle had sailed from La Rochelle with four ships for the Gulf of Mexico. He therefore took with him forty men from Fort St. Louis, and went down the river to the gulf, where he waited until Easter Monday, 1685, for La Salle's arrival. He was obliged to go back disappointed, and, on his way upwards, when he came to the Arkansas, he says: "My French companions, delighted with the beauty of the climate, asked my permission to settle there. As our intention was only to humanize and civilize the savages, by associating with them, I readily gave my consent. I formed the plan of a house for myself at the Arkansas. I left ten Frenchmen of my company there, with four Indians, to proceed with the building, and I gave them leave to lodge there themselves, and to cultivate as much of the land as they could clear. This little colony has since then so much increased and multiplied that it has become a resting place for the Frenchmen who travel in that country."

I trust, sir, we shall hear no more of the independent and unconnected Indian colonies of the Illinois and the Arkansas, nor of the pretended settlement of the French there.

You consider the charter of Louis XIV. to Crozat as a solitary document, warranted by nothing that had preceded, and supported by nothing that followed it; and you appear to believe that the first expedition to Louisiana was that of 1699 and 1700. I have shown you, sir, that that expedition was fitted out, as it is represented in the grant to Crozat, merely to carry into execution the project originally formed by La Salle. The Mississippi, from near its source to the ocean, had been discovered by him in an expedition meditated by him for many years before, for which he obtained the authority from Louis XIV., through the influence and patronage of Colbert. The expedition of Joliet, in 1673, Hennepin says, was only an envious rival attempt to forestall the great design which was even then known to be intended by La Salle, and for which he had already been making laborious and expensive preparations. Joliet reached the Mississippi, and returned without making any other discovery or any settlement; but La Salle's undertaking has every characteristic of sublime genius, magnanimous enterprise, and heroic execution. To him, and to him alone, the people of this continent are indebted for the discovery from its source to the ocean, of the Mississippi, the father of the floods; and of the numberless millions of freemen destined in this and future ages to sail on his bosom, and dwell along his banks, and those of his tributary streams, there is not one but will be deeply indebted for a large portion of the comforts and enjoyments of life to the genius and energy of La Salle.

It was in the order of Providence that he should not live to accomplish the whole of his undertaking, but that he should so nearly accomplish it as to place it beyond the power of events that it should perish with him. His project was revived immediately after the peace of Ryswick, and settlements were effected by D'Iberville and his brother, near the mouth of the Mississippi, upon the Gulf of Mexico. They languished, as they naturally must, during the war of the Spanish succession. The grant to Crozat, after a very few years, was transferred to the Mississippi Company, and soon after the peace of Utrecht the city of New Orleans was founded.

There is no doubt that, if the Viceroy of Mexico could have exterminated D'Iberville and his expedition, no French settlement on the gulf would have been made. The Spanish establishment at Pensacola had been made only one month before he arrived there, and, solely for the purpose of preventing him, the Spaniards protested even against his entering the Mississippi. So it was afterwards; when the French settlement was made at Natchitoches, immediately afterwards was founded the post at Adaes.—Wherever a Frenchman took a seat, there appeared a Spaniard from Mexico to dispute his right to it; but the original usurpation, which vitiated all those that followed, was the foundation of the presidio of Texas, after extirpating the settlement of La Salle at the Bay of St. Bernard. And so far was France from renouncing or abdicating any part of the right asserted in the charter to Crozat, that, under the Mississippi Company, M. de Bourmon was appointed, with a salary, as commandant on the Missouri, and Bernard la Harpe commandant for the Bay of St. Bernard. In August, 1721, he went there, and left a new impression of the arms of France, as a continued assertion of the title. A vessel, commanded by Berenger, had been sent there, and had left a sergeant and three men the year before. The correspondence between De la Harpe and D'Alarconne shows the respective claims both of France and Spain at that time; nor do they appear to have been, nor have you exhibited any document to show that they had been, in any manner varied, until the cession of the province to Spain, in November, 1762.

You affirm that, from the year 1693, the province of Texas has continued in perfect tranquillity under the Spanish Government, and no further attempts were made by the French to penetrate into any part of it." The letter of M. de la Harpe to Don Martin D'Alarconne, of 8th July, 1719, is sufficient to refute this assertion.

You assert that the French settlements of Natchez and Natchitoches were made only through the sufferance or permission of the Spanish Governors, for the sole purpose of trading with the Indians. We say that you have not a particle of evidence to support this assertion, and that the whole tenor of the historical evidence is to the contrary—that the post of Natchitoches, particularly, was established with the deliberate purpose of preventing a Spanish establishment there, and that the mission of St. Michael at the Adaes was founded after it, and in opposition to it. You admit, yourself, that although positive orders were issued by the Spanish Governors to drive the French from the whole district, and to destroy both the posts of Natchez and Natchitoches, yet the officer charged with the execution of the orders, after advancing with a sufficient force for that purpose, acceded to the proposals of the French at Natchitoches, that Arroyo Hondo, midway between Natchitoches and Adaes, should be considered as the dividing line until the determination of the two Courts; which state of things, you say, continued until the cession of Louisiana to Spain, in 1762. What clearer proof could be required that the French never renounced their claim to the countries watered by the Mississippi and its branches; and that Spain has nothing to oppose to that claim, which she might, not with as much force oppose to the right of France to every other part of the colony of Louisiana?

You allege that, upon the cession of Louisiana to Spain, a memoir of its proper extent and limits was drawn up by Mr. Kerlet, who had been many years Governor of the province, and delivered by the Duke de Choiseul to the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, as a supplement to the act of cession; that this memoir contained a description of its proper extent and limits, and agreed substantially with your assertions. Permit me to observe, that, had you produced the memoir itself, it might be a subject of reply or of remark; that, not having produced it, you cannot expect it should be considered as possibly differing in substance from the charter of Louis XIV., by which alone Louisiana had been held, or from the subsequent memoir of the Count de Vergennes; and that the rights of the United States can as little be affected by secret memoirs as by imaginary treaties or exterminating royal orders of Philip V. With regard to your offer of further demonstrations of the Spanish title, if they are of the like description with these, you will do well to spare yourself and me the waste of time which it would take to produce and to notice them. You have the goodness to inform me, in the name of the King, your master, that Spain has an indisputable right to all the right bank of the Mississippi, but that His Majesty has resolved to claim it solely with a view to adhere to the uti possidetis of 1764. If, sir, you will exhibit any evidence of right in Spain to the right bank of the Mississippi, it will be considered by the Government of the United States with all the attention to which it can be entitled. In the meantime, you cannot but perceive that this pre-tension is utterly incompatible both with that advanced in another part of your note, of a right in Spain to the whole circumference of the Gulf of Mexico, and with that of the uti possidetis of 1764.

The question of disputed boundaries between European settlements in America is not new. From the nature of those settlements, the imperfect geographical knowledge possessed by all the parties to them of the countries where they formed their establishments, and the grasping spirit by which they were all more or less animated in forming them, it was inevitable that disputed boundaries should be an appendage to them all. Of this spirit of boundless ambition Spain gave the most memorable example by the original pretension of engrossing to herself the whole American hemisphere. The common sense and common feeling of mankind could not, and did not, long tolerate this assumption. With what lingering reluctance, and by what ungracious gradations, Spain was compelled to recede from it, is notorious in the annals of the last three centuries; but it is among the most curious characteristics of your notes to show that she clings to these long-exploded pretensions still. You have not scrupled, even at this day, to style the most ancient settlements of other European nations in America "attempts to disturb the Spaniards in their possessions in the new world."

You recall to mind, with exultation, as if pointing to the most splendid monuments of Spanish glory, the ferociousness with which they attacked, and made prisoners, and put to death, and overthrew, dissipated, and destroyed the forts and settlements of Francis Ribaut, and René de Laudonnière, the companion of Coligny. You recite with triumph the expedition of Alonzo de Leon to scour the country and hunt out the wretched remnant of the brave and enterprising but unfortunate La Salle's establishment. You record, as one of your proudest title-deeds, the rigorous execution of the sentence of a court martial upon the Spanish Governor of Adaes, Sandoval, for yielding a musket-shot's length of ground to the French Governor of Natchitoches, suffering under the calamity of an inundation. You call the whole colony of Louisiana an intrusive establishment; style the authentic charter of Louis XIV. the absurd and despicable act of a disordered imagination; assert more than once a right of Spain to the whole circumference of the Gulf of Mexico; and talk of the territory and dominions of the Crown of Spain as if we were living in the age of Ferdinand the Catholic, or of Charles the Fifth.

To all such pretensions on the part of Spain, I am directed to inform you that the United States can never accede. The President is willing to hope that the time will come when your Government will become sensible of the uselessness of resorting to them.

From the time when the establishments of European nations on these continents became common, and their respective claims of territory under the charters of their Sovereigns were found to interfere with one another, reason, justice, and necessity, concurred in pointing out to them certain rules and principles for the adjustment of their conflicting claims. By these rules and principles we are willing that the question of the western boundary of Louisiana may be decided. Till Spain, who has repeatedly acceded to them heretofore, shall be prepared to abide by them on this occasion, it will be of little avail to pursue a discussion upon which the principles of the parties are utterly irreconcilable together.

With regard to the third of the subjects of difference between Spain and the United States that remain to be adjusted, the claims of indemnification for injuries, losses, and damages, suffered by American citizens from Spanish authorities and subjects, and within Spanish jurisdiction, I flatter myself, from the tenor of your note, devoted particularly to the consideration of this point, that it is not absolutely unsusceptible of being brought to a favorable issue. You express the willingness of your Government to resume the unratified convention of 1802, and to extend its stipulations to the cases of complaint of a similar character to those provided for in it, which have since that time accrued. It is undoubtedly the intention of this Government that its engagements should be reciprocal; and if this was not expressly declared in my note of the 16th of January, it was merely because the President was not aware that any such claims of Spanish subjects for indemnities from the American Government were in existence. I am authorized to assure you that there will be no difficulty in including any such as may exist in the convention, and in making the United States answerable for all indemnities which may be justly due by them. As you have also been empowered to include the cases of injuries and losses of the citizens of the United States, in consequence of the suppression by the Spanish intendant of the deposite at New Orleans, as stipulated by the treaty of 27th of October, 1795, it cannot be necessary for me to reply to your objections against the admission of those claims. I the more readily pass over that argument, because, as it is merely a repetition of what was urged on the same point by Mr. Cevallos in 1805, it may suffice to refer you, for a full and complete refutation of it, to the letter from Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to him of the 26th of February of that year.

But even upon this branch of the negotiation, it is with regret that the President perceives a persevering determination of your Government to exclude from the consideration of the commissioners for settling indemnities the cases of American sufferers by French spoliations committed within the jurisdiction of Spain. In answer to your reference to the arguments of Mr. Cevallos on this point, in his notes to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe of February 10 and March 5, [4.] 1805, it will be sufficient for me to refer you to their letters to him of 28th January, 12th and 26th February, 8th March, 9th April, and 12th May, with the statement then made by them of French captures of American vessels carried into the ports of Spain, and the demonstration that no indemnity for any one of those cases had even been demanded by the American Government of France, much less provided for in the conventions between the United States and France of 1800 and 1803. When you say that "no reply was made, on the part of the United States, weakening in the least the force of the principles and the truth of the facts on which the opposition of Spain to a responsibility for those damages and injuries was founded," it is impossible to account for your assertion but by supposing you have not been furnished by your Government with a copy of the above-mentioned statement. I therefore now enclose (E. No. 5) a copy of it, in which you will find how grossly mistaken, with regard to the facts, are all the allegations in the letter of the French Minister of Foreign Relations to Admiral Gravina, of 27th July, 1804, of which you have inserted in your note an entire copy, and of which Mr. Cevallos had already favored Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe with an extract.

It may be proper here to present some obvious remarks upon the frequent appeals to the opinions and assertions of France, (under the government of Napoleon,) in reference to the controversy between the United States and Spain, which were made by Mr. Cevallos at Aranjuez, in 1805, and which are now repeated by you with as much confidence as if you considered France, as then governed, the most impartial of umpires, and the most disinterested of friends.

At that time, when these opinions and representations of France were alleged by Mr. Cevallos, they were answered by the American Ministers with the firmness which became the representatives of a great and independent nation, and with the sentiment at once of their country's dignity, and of the respect due to the Government of France, with which the United States were in amity. With regard to the eastern limits of Louisiana, they observed that, the question depending upon the construction of a treaty to which the United States were a party, the opinion of France concerning it could be of no more weight in itself than that of the United States; that, in adopting the phraseology of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, when France declined substituting a more specific definition of boundaries, the United States could not be supposed to have subjected themselves to the subsequent explanatory restriction by France of that which she then chose to leave standing upon the force of the terms themselves; and that, the delivery of the province by the commissioner of France to the United States having been without any limitation, it was obvious that he had received it alike without limitation.

With respect to the French spoliations within Spanish jurisdiction, while the interest of France was so immediate and direct as to take from her opinion all right to the consideration due to an impartial arbitrator, it was supposed that the proper view of the subject had not been presented to the Emperor; and the most unequivocal demonstration was given that no indemnity or satisfaction had been received, or even demanded, from France by the United States for this description of injuries.

At this day your Government must be aware that the jumpirage, and even the opinions, of France upon these questions, was liable to other and still more decisive objections. Of the use which France was already making, and was further contemplating to make, of Spain, of her revenues and possessions, not only in Europe, but in every other quarter of the globe, little needs to be said. That she was converting to purposes of her own all the resources of Spain, has been, since then, too signally manifested to the world to require further elucidation. It was impossible for her to recognise that Spain was bound to indemnify the United States for the spoiliations of French cruisers within Spanish jurisdiction, without acknowledging herself the debtor of Spain to the same amount. To call for her testimony, therefore, was to claim her as a witness in her own cause; to appeal to her opinions, was to make her the judge of her own delinquencies. By countenancing Spain in the denial of justice to others, she did but reserve her as a richer spoil for herself; nor can it be dissembled that the recourse of Spain, on that occasion, was rather to the predominating power than to the justice of France. These observations are made, not with the view of reproaching Spain now for the compliances with which she then sought and obtained the declarations of France in her favor upon her controversies with the United States, but to show the solid and irrefragable grounds upon which the United States may refuse all deference for the opinions, and disclaim all credit to the statements of France.

At the time when France had ceded Louisiana to the United States, her good offices with Spain to secure the acquisition of Florida to the United States had been explicitly promised. The letter of Mr. Monroe to Mr. Talleyrand, of 8th November, 1804, in reminding him of that engagement, had sufficiently shown that the Government of the United States, in calling upon France for the performance of her promise, had no intention of admitting her to arbitrate upon the extent of the concession which had been made by herself. True it is that she not only espoused the side of Spain, as considering it her own, but she even stimulated Spain to the denial of justice to the United States. As her motives, if Spain could be doubtful of them then, must be abundantly notorious now, it could scarcely have been expected that Spain should still recur to them as entitled to the slightest consideration or credit.

There is no principle of the law of nations more firmly established than that which entitles the property of strangers within the jurisdiction of a country in friendship with their own to the protection of its Sovereign by all the efforts in his power. This common rule of intercourse between all civilized nations has, between the United States and Spain, the further and solemn sanction of an express stipulation by treaty. In violation both of the common usage of nations and of the express promise of Spain in the treaty, nearly two hundred vessels and their cargoes, belonging to citizens of the United States, were seized, many of them within the territorial limits of Spain, and under the cannon of her fortresses, by French cruisers; and all of them were condemned within Spanish jurisdiction.

You allege, first, that Spain has, in the cases to which reference is now made, actually carried into effect the obligations contracted by treaty; that she has used all her efforts for the defence and protection of this property. But in what have these efforts consisted? These were not cases of vessels seized by sudden violence, and carried away beyond her jurisdiction, before the officers appointed for the execution of her laws could be apprized of the wrong, and summoned to the performance of their duties. They are not cases of clandestine depredations, eluding the vigilance of the magistrates; they are cases of friendly merchants and navigators, frequenting the ports of Spain upon the faith of treaties, and for purposes of a mutual beneficial intercourse—seized, some of them, in the very harbors of Spain, by foreign cruisers, dragged on Spanish ground before a foreign Consul, and there plundered of their property before the face of all the lawful authorities of Spain, who neither raise a voice nor lift an arm for their defence. What, then, have been all the efforts of Spain for the protection of this property, conformably to the treaty?

You say, secondly, that Spain was not responsible for these depredations, because they were made by a nation with which the United States were not at war; and this you say immediately after quoting the words of the sixth article of the treaty, expressly stipulating protection and defence in the ports of Spain to the vessels and other effects of citizens of the United States, "whether they are at war or not with the Power whose subjects have taken possession of the said effects."

You observe, thirdly, that France and Spain were then allies in a war against England, and that Spain could not prevent the privateers of her ally from entering her ports. But it is not that the French privateers were allowed to enter the ports of Spain of which the United States complain, but that they were suffered to make prizes, and the French Consuls to condemn them within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain. You refer to the decision of a subordinate British court of admiralty that the prizes of a belligerent may be carried into the ports of an ally, and there lawfully condemned; but surely you do not mean to contend that the decisions of an admiralty court of one nation constitute the law of nations, or can even be adduced as authority for others. Of this principle, at least, there can be no doubt, that an alliance between two nations cannot absolve either of them from the obligations of previous treaties. Now, the treaty between Spain and the United States, by which Spain was bound to protect the property of American citizens within her jurisdiction, was concluded before the alliance between Spain and France had been contracted; and the alliance could in no wise impair the rights of the citizens of the United States to the protection of their property, stipulated in their favor by the antecedent engagement of Spain.

Your fourth and last expedient for relieving Spain from responsibility for these losses and injuries, suffered by American citizens upon her territory, is the positive assertion that satisfaction has already been made for them by France; your only voucher for which is the letter of 27th July, 1804, from Mr. Talleyrand to Admiral Gravina. The assertions of that letter I have shown, by reference to indisputable documents, are utterly without foundation.

Your subsequent offer of the good offices of your Government near that of the present Court of France to obtain indemnities for American citizens for French depredations committed within Spanish jurisdiction, by virtue of an alliance between Spain and Napoleon, you doubtless did not expect to be accepted. It is to Spain alone, sir, that the United States still look, and will continue to look, as they always have looked, for those indemnities for which Spain alone is responsible to them. I am instructed to renew to you the declaration repeatedly made by the Minister of the United States to your Government at Aranjuez, in 1805, that no satisfactory arrangement can be made of the differences between the two countries which shall not include the adjustment of these injuries.

Before bringing this reply to your four successive notes to a close, it is necessary to advert to several incidental assertions and remarks, which you have made in relation to the negotiation at Aranjuez, equally destitute of foundation with the claims and pretensions to which this letter has already replied.

In your note of the 29th December, you affirm that the negotiation at Aranjuez was "early interrupted;" and in that of the 24th January, to confirm the assertion, that, if all the differences between the two countries have not long since been adjusted, it has not depended upon the Government of Spain, you say that this is "evident, beyond the possibility of denial, from the official correspondence between His Catholic Majesty's Minister of State and the Plenipotentiaries of the American Government, who suspended and gave up the negotiation at Aranjuez, after having obstinately refused to accept the modifications, founded on strict justice, which were proposed by the Spanish Government."

The negotiation of the special mission of the United States at Aranjuez, in 1805, occupied a period of nearly five months, from the beginning of January, when Mr. Monroe arrived at Madrid, to the 22d of May, when he took leave of the King to return to London. In his address to the King on that occasion, he said: "On my arrival here I had the honor to assure your Majesty of the high consideration of my Government for your Majesty's person and Government. I then hoped to have had the honor to conclude the special mission with which I was charged, in conjunction with the Minister Plenipotentiary near your Majesty, to the advantage and satisfaction of both parties; but, being disappointed in this respect, all our propositions having been rejected, and none others ever offered on the part of your Majesty's Government, though often invited, it is my duty to return to my station at London."

This assertion, made to the King of Spain in person, at the close of that mission, was fully warranted by the transactions under it. Every one of the topics now included in your four notes, as embracing all the subjects of difference between the two countries, was discussed at great length, much in the same manner which you have now insisted upon repeating. The questions of indemnities for spoiliations, Spanish and French, and for the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, of the eastern and of the western boundary of Louisiana, were descanted upon with pertinacity as indefatigably by Don Pedro Cevallos as by yourself. He bestowed as many pages upon the terms retrocede and retrocession as you have done. He appealed with equal confidence and alacrity to the opinions, and cited with equal complacency the testimonials of the Ministers of Napoleon, and reminded Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, with a satisfaction not inferior to your own, of the "very pointed" manner in which the French Minister of Foreign Relations, Mr. Talleyrand, announcing the sentiments of His Imperial Majesty, observed, that "to make known the rights which France had acquired, was to indicate the extent and the limits of those which she transmitted to the Federal Government." To everything that had the semblance of reason and argument, adduced in the successive notes of Mr. Cevallos, the American Ministers temperately and patiently replied; they unfolded, with a clearness and precision to which nothing can now be added, the claims of the United States, and the facts and principles by which they were supported. They proposed, at the commencement of the negotiation, a projet of a convention for the adjustment of all the interests in dispute. After all the subjects had been thoroughly discussed they presented a second projet, modified in the most conciliatory spirit of accommodation to Spain. They invited, and reiterated, almost to importunity, the invitation to a counter-projet, or proposals on the part of the Spanish Government. These unwearied efforts were met by a constant, invariable, inflexible refusal, either to accept their proposals, or to make to them any whatsoever in return.

You speak of the titles, dates, documents, and arguments, produced on the "part of Spain, at that negotiation, incontestably proving, by abundant and irresistible evidence, the rights of the Spanish monarchy to the territory in question."

If such had been the facts, where would be the pretence that the American Ministers had prematurely suspended or given up the negotiation? But Mr. Cevallos produced no such titles, dates, or documents; the only title ever alleged by him in support of the pretensions of Spain was the title of retrocession, applied to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso; the only date was that of 1690, which he assigned as the period of the first Spanish settlement of Texas, which date was five years later than the settlement of La Salle, at the head of the bay of St. Bernard; and the only documents were the dictatorial and menacing testimonials of the French Minister of Foreign Relations. That all the titles, dates, and documents then referred to were insufficient, in the estimation of your own Government, to establish the rights which you have claimed, is manifest from the efforts which you have made to bring forward others, and from the character of those to which you have resorted—an unknown, and, as it is believed, imaginary treaty of 1764, and a royal exterminating order of Philip V.

You perceive, sir, that the Government of the United States is not prepared either to renounce any of the claims which it has been so long urging upon the justice of Spain, or to acquiesce in any of those arguments which appear to you so luminous and irresistible.

Determined to pursue the establishment of their rights as long as by any possibility they can be pursued through the paths of peace, they have acquiesced, as the Message of the President at the commencement of the present session of Congress has informed you, in that policy of Spain which has hitherto procrastinated the amicable adjustment of these interests, not from any insensibility to their importance to this Union, nor from any indifference to the object of being upon cordial terms of harmony with Spain, but because peace is among the dearest and most earnest objects of their policy; and because they have considered, and still consider it more congenial to the principles of humanity, and to the permanent welfare of both nations, to wait for the favorable operation of time upon the prejudices and passions opposed to them, than to resort to the unnecessary agency of force. After a lapse of thirteen years of patient forbearance, in waiting for the moment when Spain shall find it expedient to meet their constant desire of bringing to a happy and harmonious termination all the conflicting interests between them, it will need little additional effort to wait somewhat longer with the same expectation. The President deems this course even more advisable than that of referring the questions depending between the two nations to the arbitration or mediation of one or more friendly European Powers, as you have been authorized to propose. The statement in your note of the 10th of February, in reference to this subject, is not altogether correct. It is not the British Government which, on this occasion, has offered; but your Government, which, without first consulting or asking the concurrence of the United States, has requested the mediation of Great Britain. The British Government, as must be well known to you, have declined the offer of their mediation, unless it should be requested by both parties; and have communicated to the Government of the United States this overture on the part of Spain.

The President has thought proper, from motives which he has no doubt will be deemed satisfactory both to Great Britain and Spain, to decline uniting in this request. He is indeed, fully persuaded that, notwithstanding any prepossessions which the British Government may have heretofore entertained with regard to any of the points in controversy, they would have been entirely discarded in assuming the office of a mediator. But it has hitherto been the policy, both of Europe and of the United States, to keep aloof from the general federative system of each other. The European States are combined together, and connected with one another by a multitude of important interests and relations with which the United States have no concern, with which they have always manifested the determination not to interfere, and of which, no communication being made to them by the Governments of Europe, they have not information competent to enable them to estimate their extent and bearings. The United States, in justice to themselves, in justice to that harmony which they earnestly desire to cultivate with all the Powers of Europe, in justice to that fundamental system of policy which forbids them from entering the labyrinth of European politics, must decline soliciting or acceding to the interference of any other Government of Europe for the settlement of their differences with Spain.

But however discouraging the tenor and character of your recent notes have been to the hopes which the promises and professions of your Government had excited, that the time for adjustment of these differences with Spain herself had at length arrived, the United States will not abandon the expectation that more correct views of the subject will ultimately be suggested to your Government, and they will always be disposed to meet them in the spirit of justice and amity. With regard to those parts of the province of Louisiana which have been incorporated within the State of that name, it is time that the discussion should cease. Forming part of the territory of a sovereign and independent State of this Union, to dispose of them is not within the competency of the Executive Government of the United States, nor will the discussion be hereafter continued. But if you have proposals to make, to which it is possible for the Government of the United States to listen with a prospect of bringing them to any practicable conclusion, I am authorized to receive them, and to conclude with you a treaty for the adjustment of all the differences between the two nations, upon terms which may be satisfactory to both.

With regard to the motives for the occupation of Amelia Island, the Messages from the President of the United States to Congress, and my letter to you of 16th January, have given the explanations which, it is presumed, will be satisfactory to your Government. The exposed and feeble situation of that island, as well as of the remainder of East Florida, with their local position in the neighborhood of the United States, have always been among the primary inducements of the United States for urging to Spain the expediency to the interests of both nations that Spain should cede them for a just and suitable equivalent to the United States. In the letter of the 28th of January, 1805, from Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe to Mr. Cevallos, the following passage stands prominent among the arguments used by them to that effect: "Should Spain," say they, "not place a strong force in Florida, it will not escape your excellency's attention that it will be much exposed to the danger of being taken possession of by some other Power, who might wish to hold it with very different views towards Spain than those which animate the Government of the United States. Without a strong force being there, it might even become an asylum for adventurers and freebooters, to the great annoyance of both nations."

You know, sir, how far the events, thus anticipated, and pointed out so early as in January, 1805, to the prudent forecast of Spain, have been realized. Pensacola has been occupied by another Power, for the purpose of carrying on war from it against the United States; and Amelia Island has been occupied by adventurers, to the great annoyance of both nations, and of all others engaged in lawful commerce upon the Gulf of Mexico. Before these events occurred the Congress of the United States, aware of the great and growing danger of them, which had been so long before distinctly foreseen, had made it the duty of the Executive Government, in the case of such a contingency, to take the temporary possession of the country, which might be necessary to avert the injuries that must result from it. Amelia Island was taken, not from the possession of Spain, but of those from whom she had been equally incapable of keeping or of recovering its possession, and who were using it for purposes incompatible with the laws of nations and of the United States. No purpose, either of taking or of retaining it as a conquest from Spain, has ever been entertained; and, unless ceded by Spain to the United States, it will be restored whenever the danger of its being again thus occupied and misused shall have ceased.

It is needless to add, that the proposal that the United States should take any further measures than those already provided for by law, for preventing armaments hostile to Spain within the territories of the United States is inadmissible. The measures already taken, and the laws already existing against all hostile armaments within our jurisdiction, incompatible with the obligations of neutrality, are sufficient for its preservation, and the necessary means will continue to be used, as they have been, to carry them faithfully into execution. I have the honor to be, &c.

Don Martin D'Alarconne to M. De la Harpe.

TRINITY RIVER, May 20, 1719.

MONSIEUR: I am very sensible of the politeness that M. De Bienville and yourself have had the goodness to show to me. The orders I have received from the King, my master, are to maintain a good understanding with the French of Louisiana; my own inclinations lead me equally to afford them all the services that depend upon me, but I am compelled to say that your arrival at the Nassonite village surprises me very much.

Your Governor could not be ignorant that the post you occupy belongs to my Government, and that all the lands west of the Nassonites depend upon New Mexico.

I counsel you to give advice of this to M. Bienville, or you will force me to oblige you to abandon lands that the French have no right to occupy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

B. No. 2.

Monsieur de la Harpe to Don Martin D'Alarconne.

NASSONITE, July 8, 1719.

MONSIEUR: The order from His Catholic Majesty to maintain a good understanding with the French of Louisiana, and the kind intentions you have yourself expressed towards them, accord but little with your proceedings. Permit me to inform you that M. de Bienville is perfectly informed of the limits of his government, and is very certain that the post of Nassonite depends not upon the dominions of His Catholic Majesty. He knows, also, that the province of Lastekas, in which you say you are Governor, is a part of Louisiana. M. de la Salle took possession in 1685, in the name of His Most Christian Majesty; and, since the above epoch, possession has been renewed from time to time.

Respecting the post of Nassonite, I cannot comprehend by what right you pretend that it forms a part of New Mexico. I beg leave to represent to you that Don Antoine du Miroir, who discovered New Mexico in 1683, never penetrated east of that province or the Rio Bravo. It was the French who first made alliances with the savage tribes in this region; and it is natural to conclude that a river that flows into the Mississippi, and the lands it waters, belong to the King, my master.

If you will do me the pleasure to come into this quarter, I will convince you I hold a post I know how to defend.

I have the honor to be &c.

DE LA HARPE.

C. No. 3.

On the 10th of August, 1721, M. de la Harpe received the following order:

We, John Baptiste de Bienville, chevalier of the military order of St. Louis, and commandant general for the King in the province Louisiana:

It is hereby decreed that M. de la Harpe, commandant of the bay of St. Bernard, shall embark in the packet the Subtile, commanded by Berenger, with a detachment of twenty soldiers under M. de la Belile, and shall proceed forthwith to the bay of St. Bernard, belonging to this province, in the name of the King, and the west company shall plant the arms of the King in the ground, and build a fort upon whatever spot appears most advantageous for the defence of the place.

If the Spaniards, or any other nation, have taken possession, M. de la Harpe will signify to them that they have no right to the country; it being well known that possession was taken in 1685 by M. de la Salle, in the name of the King of France, &c.

Extracts translated from the "Diccionario Geografico Historico de las Indias Occidentales ó America," by Colonel Don Antonio de Alcedo, captain of the royal Spanish guards; printed at Madrid in 1786-89, by the permission of Government, and dedicated to the Prince of Asturias, afterwards Charles the Fourth.

"Louisiana, a province and government of North America, one of the two which form new France, bounded on the south by the Gulf of Mexico, on the north by the river Illinois and the Indian tribes of the Pamasus, Paducas, Osages, Tronones, Tecagas, Chavanons, and others; on the east by West Florida, Georgia, and Carolina; and on the west by New Mexico and New Spain. Its extent from north to south is about fifteen degrees; that is to say, from the twenty-fifth to the fortieth degree of north latitude; and from east to west ten or eleven degrees, between the eighty-sixth and ninety-sixth degrees of west longitude; its limits, however, not being precisely fixed, M. de Lisle gives it a much greater extent, particularly towards the north, where it borders on Canada; and, according to him, it is afterwards bounded by New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, &c., and to the west by the rivers Bravo and Salado."

"Missouri, an Indian tribe of the province and government of Louisiana, inhabiting the banks of the river of the same name, on which a fort was built by the French for defence of that establishment."

"Natchitoches, or Natihetoches, as pronounced by some a tribe of Indians of the province and government of Louisiana, in North America, living fifty leagues up the Red river, by which name they are sometimes called. This tribe has always been friendly to the French, and hostile to the Spaniards; is very numerous, and has upwards of two hundred cabins. The French soldiers who had completed their time of service settled in an island in the Red river, where they built a fort, and called it Natchitoches; but having planted tobacco, and discovered that the sand blown on it by the wind gave it a bad quality, they removed their settlement to the main land, where they succeeded in cultivating that plant, so as to give it a particular estimation; it is sixty leagues from New Orleans."

"Rouge, (Red river,) a large and rapid river of the province and government of Louisiana, in North America, takes its rise about the tribe of the Caneisis, runs southeast, and, after receiving other streams, changes its course to the south as far as the tribe and fort of Natchitoches, where it again turns to the southeast, forms several lakes and islands, and thence, running eastward, joins the Mississippi much increased, near where the river empties into the sea."

A statement of facts relative to American vessels taken by French privateers, and condemned in Spanish ports, obtained from the most authentic sources.

Of the French spoliations, there have been fifty appeals from the consular judgments in Spain to the Council of Prizes at Paris, of which thirty have been released, nine condemned, and twelve are yet depending. Not one sous has been paid in any case, nor is there a single case of such spoliations on the list of liquidations now at the French treasury, which are to participate of the twenty millions of livres to be paid by the United States to their citizens, under the treaty of 1803, on account of French spoliations. The American Minister never did demand payment of French spoliations made in Spain, knowing them as such; nor did the American agent ever demand it by his order or knowledge. The first intelligence which the American Government had of appeals being permitted from the French consular tribunals in Spain to the Council of Prizes in France was received from Spain herself.

As soon as it was received, the Secretary of State wrote to the American Minister in Paris to know what the fact was, and instructed him, at the same time, to prohibit the agent from acting in such cases; it having been, at all times, the opinion of the Government that Spain alone was answerable, of whom only has the recompense been demanded.

Don Luis de Onís to the Secretary of State.

MARCH 23, 1818.

SIR: I have read with deliberate reflection the note which you addressed to me on the 12th of this month, in reply to those which I had the honor to write to you on the 29th December, and on the 5th, 8th, and 24th January, of the present year, on the different points embraced in the dispute hitherto pending between the Government of the United States and that of Spain.

Relations with Spain.

After examining, with the strictest impartiality, all the data and arguments advanced by you, without yielding to any other impressions than those inspired by the sincere desire of ascertaining the truth of facts, and the propriety of their application to the several points in dispute, I cannot but express to you, sir, that it has not been possible for my reason to discover anything capable of forming a just exception to the principles and grounds which support the rights sustained by His Catholic Majesty's Government, as notorious, and hitherto undisputed with the Crown of Spain.

I perceive that, on the question of boundaries, you still maintain the same pretensions as those advanced by Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe, at Aranjuez, to the Spanish Government—pretensions which it appears to me impossible to exist, after weighing the arguments adduced by the Secretary of State of His Catholic Majesty, Don Pedro Cevallos, and again urged more at length and with sufficient conviction, in my judgment, in the notes which I had the honor to address to you.

On the subject of the eastern boundaries of Louisiana, you insist they should be extended by West Florida to the river Perdido, although this pretension has no other foundation than the particular and specious interpretation attempted to be given to the clauses of the treaty concluded between France and Spain in 1800, for the retrocession of Louisiana. But I do not conceive how these clauses can admit such an interpretation, because it gives a strained interpretation to and inverts its proper import, is contradictory to the intention of the contracting parties, and attributes to their contract a latitude which does not appear in it. How can it be imagined that West Florida, or any part of it, should be the object of the treaty of 1800, when, throughout the whole of it, there does not appear a single word referring or alluding to that province, or any mention being made of it? Did there ever exist a public treaty, or even a simple transaction between private persons, stipulating a thing of which the slightest mention is not made? Certainly not. Besides, the two contracting parties declare and maintain that it was not their intention to include, nor did they include, Florida, or any part of it, in the retrocession. How, then, can the contrary be maintained, merely by the help of a particular conception or conjecture? The objections you make against the personal character of the Minister Talleyrand, and the temper of the French Cabinet at the time of Napoleon, can never weaken the authority of the solemn declaration of the Government of France. You will also recollect that the same Government gave the assurance that it had ordered them to be communicated to that of the United States, and that the Spanish Government brought them forward as soon as the present dispute was set on foot, which they could not be before, as the possibility of this case did not enter into their contemplation, nor could they calculate on its being objected to without necessity or just reason.

Notwithstanding, therefore, your ingenious arguments, I continue in the firm persuasion that the three clauses of the Treaty of San Ildefonso neither can nor do in any manner admit of the comment or abstract interpretation which is now attempted to be given to them, and that it is impossible to vary the obviously genuine and literal sense in which they have ever been understood by the Governments of France and Spain.

You say, and affirm decisively, that the secret convention between Spain and France, by which the Most Catholic King ceded Louisiana to His Christian Majesty, did not take effect in 1764, but in 1762, one year before the general treaty of peace concluded at Paris 10th February, 1763, by which the Floridas were ceded to Great Britain. If that be so, I confess I cannot comprehend or reconcile the concluding clauses inserted in the seventh article of the same treaty, which run as follows: "The Most Christian King cedes to His Britannic Majesty, in full property, the river and port of Mobile, and all that he possessed or ought to have possessed on the left side of the river Mississippi, with the exception of the city of New Orleans, and of the island in which it is situated, which shall remain to France." How is it, then, that in this treaty the bay and port of Mobile are ceded to England, and all that France possessed or ought to have possessed on the left of the Mississippi, with the exception of the island and city of New Orleans, which are expressly to remain in France? How could they remain to France, if in the former year they had been ceded to Spain? We must deny the faith of this treaty, or admit that the cession made to Spain did not take effect until a subsequent period; and by a necessary consequence, that when France made the said cession to the Crown of Spain, she possessed nothing more in that part of the American continent, since she had before ceded all to Great Britain; it being notorious, moreover, that France continued in the dominion and possession of the delta of Louisiana until the 19th of August, 1769, at which time she delivered up that province to Spain, and into the hands of General O'Reilly. By this we are convinced of the true understanding of the three clauses of the treaty of 1800. Louisiana did not then include, in the hands of Spain, any part of the Floridas, nor did France possess more than the delta of New Orleans when she ceded and delivered it to Spain. To these two undeniable facts do the first and second clauses of that treaty refer; the third refers to what appears in the treaties which afterwards followed between Spain and other Powers. If it is not wished to introduce confusion where there is none, it is necessary to ascertain the precise period at which the time began that this clause refers to. I do not see that any other can be found than that when France ceased to possess the delta of Louisiana; and if the cession made by her to Spain was effected after that made by France and Spain to England on the 10th of February, 1763, it is evident that this clause could not refer to the Treaty of Paris concluded the same day and year, but to those which were subsequent to it, as the same clause expressly declares.

In my note of the 5th of January last, I cited the treaties to which this treaty could and did refer, and pointed out at the same time the meaning and object of the contracting parties in framing its stipulation, by referring to the treaties themselves. I discover nothing to weaken the force and propriety of what I then proved to you, nor do I think that there can be anything advanced without altering or destroying the decisive sense of the clauses of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso.

The ingenuity of logic may suggest evasions, but never can furnish solid arguments to maintain the contrary; and as it is our duty only to ascertain the truth, we must confine ourselves to the literal text of the treaty of retrocession, and to that of others referred to in it. Notwithstanding Don Pedro Cevallos, in his letter of 24th February, 1805, to Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe, only spoke of the treaties concluded between Spain and England in 1783, and between Spain and the United States in 1795, that neither is nor can be a reason why we may not now refer to some other treaty capable of shedding light on the point in question. In fine, I consider it as a point fully demonstrated and indisputable, that Spain retroceded Louisiana to France only as she had received it from her, and as she then possessed it without any connexion whatever with Florida.

I cannot conceive how the plain and decisive clauses of the treaty of 1800 can be susceptible of any other interpretation which is in perfect accord with the tenor of the royal cedula issued by His Catholic Majesty, at Barcelona, on the 15th of October, 1802, for the purpose of completing and carrying into effect the act of the retrocession of Louisiana. His Catholic Majesty therein declares that he has retroceded Louisiana, and gives orders for its delivery, with the same extent it now has, and that it had under the dominion of France, when ceded by that Power to his Royal Crown. You are aware, sir, that it was by virtue of the royal cedula that the retrocession of the said province took place, and that it is a document regulating and explanatory of the contract passed at St. Ildefonso. As such was it received by France, who, on taking possession of Louisiana in virtue of the said royal cedula, and in conformity thereto, never exacted or pretended to anything more.

In consideration, therefore, of treaties, documents, and acts of so solemn a nature, which decide the question with the greatest precision and clearness, no room is left for personal doubts or individual opinions.

I now pass, sir, to your observations on the question of the western boundaries of Louisiana.

I have before said, and now repeat it to you, that the King, my master, glories in the religious observance of all existing treaties between Spain and other Powers, and sincerely desires that, in conformity with them, and the inviolable principles of general justice and public good faith, the limits which separate or ought to separate Louisiana from the provinces and territories possessed by His Majesty to the westward thereof should be carefully examined, investigated, and determined. He has proposed as a basis of this inquiry the uti possidetis, or state of possession by France when she ceded Louisiana to the Crown of Spain, and has moreover admitted in the basis all that Spain delivered to France, as incorporated in Louisiana, and all that was stipulated in favor of the United States by the treaty of 1795. I conceive there can be no other basis of an examination, investigation, and final demarcation of the said boundaries, if we are to regulate them agreeably to public treaties, and the solemn principles of justice and good faith. This basis being admitted, such as I propose it, all the equivocal expressions and interminable disputes to which the contradictory narratives of the early French missionaries and settlers who penetrated into this part of America have opened so wide a field, would at once be put an end to. In fact I cannot persuade myself that such narratives are entitled to a place either in diplomacy or in sound criticism.

In my note on the question of the western limits of Louisiana, I likewise touched on the principal facts, data, and grounds on which the notorious right of the Crown of Spain to the territories in dispute is founded. These facts, data, and grounds, do not receive their credit or support from the tales or narratives of travellers, missionaries, or adventurers who may have made excursions in America, nor from the memoirs or writings which have since been published, and are merely copies of these narratives and marvellous tales.

They receive their credit and support from titles and documents of the most unexceptionable character, as will be shown in due time, having confined myself to indicating them to you, and conceived that it was not absolutely necessary to accompany my notes with the volumes of books, papers, and documents, extant on the subject, because that would have been too troublesome, and because the Crown of Spain being from time immemorial in possession of the territories to which your Government forms pretensions, that fact alone was sufficient to resist them, seeing that on the part of the United States no documents or titles were exhibited which could support their right to the territories in question. Let us see, then, on what your Government founds these pretensions, and how they are supported by you in your note of the 12th instant. The following are the data stated by you, and on which you say the United States found their claims:

1. The discovery of the Mississippi from near its source to the ocean by the French from Canada, in 1683.

2. The possession taken, and establishment made by La Salle, at the bay of St. Bernard, west of the rivers Trinity and Colorado, by authority from Louis XIV., in 1685.

3. The charter from Louis XIV. to Crozat, in 1712.

4. The historical authority of Du Pratz and Champigny, and of the Count de Vergennes.

5. The geographical authority of De Lisle's map, and especially that of the map of Don Thos.

Lopez, geographer to the King of Spain, published in 1764, [1762.]

Such are the data or grounds alleged by you in support of the pretensions of your Government, and to refute what I have advanced in defence of the rights of Spain.

I now proceed to answer each one of these data, or grounds, by reproducing those which I urged in my former note, and presenting them in their aspect and true light.

As to the first, I maintain that long before Joliet, Marquette, and Hennepin, or any other Frenchman, had penetrated from Canada as far as the banks of the Mississippi and Arkansas, the Spaniards had discovered and explored both those rivers in different and repeated expeditions which took place from the time that Juan Ponce de Leon discovered the coast and country of Florida, and took possession of them in the name of the King of Spain, in 1512. These expeditions were not, as you say, made by travellers, but by Spanish commanders, acting under the orders and authority of their Government, and with vessels, troops, artillery, and other means necessary for carrying their enterprises into execution. Consequently it is of little consequence that Joliet, Marquette, and Hennepin, or others, may have traversed the country from Canada, and met with rivers and territories which, many years before, had already been discovered by Spaniards, and included in the dominions of the monarchy. What armies did Joliet, Marquette, and Hennepin, take with them to dispute this country and its rivers with the Crown of Spain? What settlements did they found and maintain there? Such excursions as these neither give nor could give France any right to those rivers and countries, nor could she have any secure dominion over the soil, if we admit the principle that such invasions confer the right of property on the nation to which the individuals making them happen to belong.

Nor is the argument deduced by you from the expedition undertaken by La Salle more fortunate. It is the second of the grounds on which your Government founds its claims. I also maintain that La Salle never made but one excursion into the country already known to the Spaniards, and incorporated in the dominions of the monarchy. There exists sufficient documents and testimony to prove that the Spaniards had entered the bay of St. Bernard long before, and had taken possession of it and of the whole country on the coast and into the interior. The fort built by La Salle for his defence against the Indians could confer no right on France to that bay, or to that country; and it is a certain fact that the Viceroy of New Spain, on receiving advice of this incursion, immediately despatched a force; they had been unfortunate; they no longer existed; and the expedition sent from New Mexico met with nothing more than the shattered fragments of one of their vessels at the entrance of the bay. More effectual measures were afterwards adopted by the Government of Spain for the defence of the coast and preservation of the interior of the country; so that there is no recollection, even in the narratives and wonderful romances of the early French settlers and travellers, of any individual of that nation having afterwards made the smallest attempt against the bay of St. Bernard.

The third ground cited by you is the famous charter granted by Louis XIV. to M. Crozat. A wretched document, indeed! It may in truth be said that this charter of Louis XIV. is very like that you mention, granted by the Pope's bull, in which, seated on his chair at Rome, he divides unknown seas and lands between Spain and Portugal. By what authority could Louis XIV. bestow on Crozat the territories and rivers discovered and possessed by Spain in that part of the new world? From everything that appears, it is plain that they who granted this cession or charter in the name of Louis XIV., had no knowledge nor any exact idea of the situation, extent, or circumstances of the country they were speaking of. They were equally ignorant of the extent of the acquisitions and dominions of Spain in that part of America, and proceeded under the impression of the tales and flattering narratives of the early French explorers, and principally that collected by the missionary Hennepin from his own imagination, published at Paris, and dedicated to Colbert, or, it may be, to Louis XIV. The Spanish Government always viewed this grant with contempt, and went on in the peaceable possession of those dominions, extending their settlements as circumstances permitted, and founding towns and forts as they found it convenient. It always opposed the invasions and incursions of the French, and I cannot conceive how the royal orders issued by Philip II., which you term sanguinary, or those successively issued by other Spanish monarchs to preserve and defend their dominions by expelling the foreigners who attempted to invade them, can be called sanguinary acts. The fact is, that these royal orders were duly carried into execution; whereas the grant, so much cried up, remained a dead letter.

In my letter of January last, I stated to you the manner in which the French got a footing in the bay of Biloxi, and afterwards spread themselves on the lower shores of the Mississippi, by the permission or toleration of the Spanish Government. It is, therefore, superfluous to dwell longer on this point.

4th. As to what regards the fourth ground which you have adduced, I am at a loss to perceive how it can answer the purpose intended. Whatever authority Du Pratz, Champigny, and the Count de Vergennes, may be entitled to in matters of history, it is unquestionable that all they wrote on Louisiana and countries adjacent was taken from the incorrect, exaggerated, and marvellous narratives of the early French travellers, explorers, and settlers; and it is no less so that their assertions or notions are contradicted by facts and truths of the most decided authenticity and notoriety.

In addition to what has been laid down by the most respectable Spanish historians and chroniclers of those early times, and by subsequent writers, there exist unexceptionable acts, despatches, and documents, transmitted by the Council of the Indies in Spain to the tribunals, secretaries, officers, and others in Mexico, as well as to those in other parts, and also to several in the island of Cuba, which prove the facts I have pointed out to you in my aforesaid note of the 5th of January last. Nor are there wanting documents and proofs to be found in different writings and memoirs by foreigners, corroborating the certainty of the same facts, and completely confuting and destroying the idle tales and fanciful description which the missionary Hennepin has foisted into his memoir dedicated to the French Government. Nothing is to be found in the famous grant of Louis XIV., in the writings of Du Pratz and Champigny, or in the memoir of the Count de Vergennes, invoked by you in support of the pretensions of your Government, which is not a multiplied repetition of what has been imagined and written by that French missionary. These tales and flattering descriptions pass from mouth to mouth among the adventurers, traders, and settlers from Canada to Biloxi; and as that nation has an itch for writing and publishing everything that flatters the imagination, it is not surprising that we find the same wanderings, fables, or errors in many writings published by them. But you are sensible, sir, that tales and narratives of this description are inadmissible, both in diplomacy and sound criticism, which will only admit unexceptionable titles and legal documents. The same remark will apply to what was written by the Chevalier Tonti, cited by you as a decisive and incontrovertible proof of your assertions. Although the fact, or things referred to in it were admitted, they would prove nothing in favor of their intended application, nor in the least weaken the force of antecedent titles and facts, on which the Spanish Government found their resistance to the unbanded and absolute pretensions of the United States.

I proceed to the fifth ground advanced by you—"the geographical authority of Mr. De Lisle and of Don Thomas Lopez." I think there can be little doubt that Mr. De Lisle framed his map on the same erroneous data and fabulous description I have spoken of in the preceding paragraph. It is a well known fact that Don Thomas Lopez, wholly uninformed respecting the country he wished to delineate on his map, copied from that of Mr. De Lisle all the errors remarked in it; and the same happened, with little variation, to Don Antonio Alcedo. You cannot but have noticed, sir, the numerous errors, ambiguities, and extravagances, which are to be found in the works of a multitude of geographers and writers who treat of subjects they have never seen, or taken the pains to verify with critical exactness. The circumstance of Don Thomas Lopez having been Geographer to the King of Spain neither adds nor gives any authority to his map, because he neither drew it up nor published it under the authority or by order of His Majesty's Government; and the errors into which he or Alcedo may have fallen, do not, nor can they in the least, prejudice the rights of the Crown of Spain, or change the nature of things, or the positive certainty of facts. In opposition to the errors of that Spanish geographer, to those of Alcedo, and of the Frenchman De Lisle, from whom they copied them, we have the testimony, in everything substantial, of all the maps and charts that have been published from the most accurate knowledge of the country, and conformably to the treaties concluded between those Powers which possess or did possess dominions in that part of America. Among the French themselves, you may examine the maps of D'Anville, Janvier, Bonne, and others; likewise that published at London in 1757, by Emanuel Bowen, Geographer to His Britannic Majesty; that published at London by Carrington Bowles, according to the observations of the Royal Academy of Sciences; the American Atlas, or geographical description of the whole American continent, according to the observations and researches of Major Holland, Lewis Sevens, [Evans,] Julian Scull, &c., published at London in 1778, by Thomas Jeffreys, Geographer to the King, and others; the large map of New Spain, and countries bordering on it, published by Baron Humboldt; and the map published by I. B. Pierson in 1811, from the former.

I might cite many others, not only by Spanish geographers, but also by foreigners; but I deem it superfluous, under a thorough conviction that nothing can be found in opposition to the data and grounds I have advanced, but what appears in writings and maps composed at pleasure, and wholly incompatible with public treaties, and the most notorious and undeniable facts and truths.

The observations I have just made appear to me sufficient to destroy the weight of the data you have laid down as forming the grounds of the pretensions of your Government. I am aware that they have been already advanced, as you remark, by Messrs. Pinckney and Monroe, at the time of the discussion at Aranjuez; but as they were then completely refuted, I did not suppose they would be again brought forward. I have, indeed, seen the same data referred to in several writings published in this country since the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States, and maps formed here on bases assumed by those formerly published, abounding in errors and unsupported positions; but I did not, nor do I, conceive that they can have the smallest weight when opposed by facts and the principles most respected among nations.

You state that the United States can cite to me the geographical work, published at London in 1712, [1717,] entitled Atlas Geographicus; the British map, published in 1755, by Bowen; the narratives, published at Paris, of Hennepin, in 1683; of Tonti, in 1697; and of Joutel, [Joutel,] in 1713; the letter from Colonel La Harpe to Don Martin de Alarconne, of 6th [8th] July, 1719; the order from the French Governor of Louisiana, Bienville, to La Harpe, of 10th August, 1721; and, finally, the geographical work of Don Antonio Alcedo, and the map of Don Thomas Lopez. It is very certain that the United States may cite these writings and maps, and many others, founded upon the data above alluded to; but it is no less certain that such writings and maps are wholly undeserving of credit, being founded on narratives void of truth, or on the most doubtful ideas, in direct contradiction to public facts and the most solemn treaties, and completely disproved by the authentic and unquestionable history of the Spanish discoveries and settlements, as well as by an immense number of documents, beyond the reach of contradiction, which prove my assertion. I am perfectly aware of the attempts of the French to encroach on the Spanish dominions when they were in Louisiana, and to give a color to their pretensions by recurring to the vague expressions of Louis XIV., and the romances of Hennepin and others, but which were never formally urged or sustained by his Government, and were always treated as absurd by Spain. The wish of the French speculators, traders, and settlers, to spread themselves in the territories of the Crown of Spain, and countries bordering on them, and make incursions into those territories, has nothing wonderful in it; because, the greater part of those territories being desert, and the French being then exclusively engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi, it was quite natural for them to penetrate into the adjacent countries, for the purpose of trading with the Indians, as it was for them to wish to establish posts or settlements for the benefit of their trade. But this, assuredly, has no connexion with the right you state they acquired to the whole of the immense country extending to the river Bravo.

The fact, which neither can nor does admit a doubt, is, that Spain has constantly been the mistress and possessor of that country, and of all the territories now contended for by the United States, during the whole period that Louisiana was held by France, and much earlier, with the exception of the points and districts which have been taken possession of by the United States. The French themselves never carried their pretensions beyond the space comprehended between the left bank of the Rio Roxo, (Red River,) as far as the point of Natchitoches, the bank of the Mississippi, the adjacent coast, where the river Caricut, or Calcasia, empties into the gulf, and the left bank of that river, which was always considered the boundary, to its source, between the Spanish province of Texas and French Louisiana; and this is the reason why France never made the smallest opposition to the building of the three presidios or forts, Nacogdoches, Orcoquezac, and San Miguel de los Adaes, by Spain. How, then, could it be contended that, in the face of facts so undeniable, of titles of property of the most genuine character, and of uninterrupted possession from time immemorial, the vague pretensions of the French should be entitled to any weight, since they have no other foundation than the incorrect, contradictory, and absurd narratives of the early travellers, explorers, and traders of that nation, who made momentary excursions from Canada and the bay of Biloxi into that vast country? I shall now present the data extracted by you from my note of the 5th January last in their genuine sense and true aspect.

1. Discovery of the Mississippi, of the Arkansas, and of the Rio Negro to its source, by the Spaniards, under Don Alonzo de Soto, in 1541. Discovery of Florida, and possession taken of the eastern part thereof by the Spaniards, under Don Juan Ponce de Leon, in 1512. Continuation of discoveries and settlements in Florida by the Spaniards, in 1525, under Vasquez de Ayllon; in 1527, under Panfilo de Narvaez; in 1538, under Adelantado Hernando de Soto; and successively by the Spanish governors of that province, which then comprehended the whole country from the Rio de las Palmas, which is the boundary of Panuco, to latitude 48°, extending more than six hundred leagues, and crossing the Mississippi; the whole being carried on by means of regular expeditions, composed of vessels, troops, artillery, and every requisite for carrying them into execution.

2. Dominion of the Crown of Spain over the whole coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and the vast regions in the interior of Florida and Mexico, from the beginning of the sixteenth century; the Kingdoms of Leon and Santander, founded in 1579 and following years; the Kingdom of New Mexico, founded in 1595; the province of Cohaguila, a few years afterwards; and that of Texas, after 1690.

3. Successive increase by Spain of settlements, towns, and forts, at the places judged most suitable, in the interior provinces of Mexico and in Florida; she remaining in possession of the whole coast, and defending it, as often as occasion required, against the invasion or incursions of foreigners, down to the latter times.

In support of these data, there is alleged, on the part of Spain, a notorious and indisputable right of first discovery and first occupation or conquest, and that of uninterrupted possession to the present time, which refer to a long course of public facts and authentic documents, and by which they are identified and proved, on the highest testimony of which human events are susceptible. And what has been replied to all this, on the part of the American Ministers at the Court of Spain? They threw themselves back, if I may say so, upon the same data and allegations which they had at first advanced, and are now again brought forward by you, without producing any additional facts that can strengthen your pretensions—the famous grant of Louis XIV. to Crozat; the transient incursions, or, if you are pleased to call them so, the formal expeditions of Bernard de la Salle; some point or another occupied by the French, at distinct periods, on the coast of Florida and on the lower shores of the Mississippi; the post they were permitted to hold in Illinois; and those they also obtained in the immediate neighborhood of the Rio Roxo (Red River) and the Arkansas. That is all; and that is considered sufficient to confer on France the right of property to the whole extent of those immense territories, and to dispossess Spain of the ancient possession and dominion over them! I am at a loss to conceive on what this mode of reasoning can be founded.

The grant of Louis neither has nor can have any value, no more than any other grant issued by another monarch or government, in like cases, could be valid, if the countries thus disposed of were not in possession of Louis XIV., or if France had no well-founded right to them. Now, then, the countries to which your Government forms pretensions, westward of the present Louisiana to the Rio Bravo, were never in the possession of Louis XIV., nor of any other monarch of France, as you will certainly admit. As to which forms the point of right, I know of nothing on which Louis XIV. could have founded it but the incursions of La Salle, and those of some trader or missionary.

I wish not to rob La Salle of the glory you are disposed to allow him for his brilliant enterprises and sublime philanthropy. But what I have alleged, and can prove by the fullest evidence of which facts of this nature are susceptible, is, that La Salle did nothing more than traverse from Frontenac to the shores of the Mississippi, through territories which, although included in the dominions of the Crown of Spain, were still desert, and without forts or garrisons to check the incursions of that French adventurer; that nothing resulted from them. The fort of Crèvecoeur, which was necessary for his protection against the Indians, was immediately destroyed by them; and that said to have been left under the command of Ribaut, was destroyed by the Spaniards, who, headed by Governor Melendez, attacked it without loss of time, and made prisoners of Ribaut and his whole party. The same happened in the case of the unfortunate shipwreck of La Salle on the coast of the province of Texas. He was enabled to save himself by landing at the bay of St. Bernard; and, flying from the Indians, proceeded upwards by the banks of the Trinidad river. He then raised a redoubt or fort to defend himself against their attack, and, leaving several of his party there, he advanced into the interior of the country, and fell a victim of assassination. The Indians immediately demolished the fort, and barbarously sacrificed the few French in it who had not been able to make their escape. An expedition was despatched by the Viceroy of Mexico, with a competent force, to repel La Salle's invasion, the moment he received notice of it. This expedition advanced a great distance into the country, and descended as low as the bay of St. Bernard, as I have already said, but met no Frenchmen, or other foreigners. From that time the dominion of the Crown of Spain to that whole coast, and all the territories of that province, was preserved with perfect tranquillity; and towns were quickly founded, and forts built wherever they appeared necessary for defence. Can there be a reason, then, for attributing to the French a right to that whole coast, and those extensive territories, from the simple occurrence of these momentary incursions, or, it may be, expeditions, which miscarried without effecting anything?

I declare, too, that I do not wish to derogate from the veneration and confidence with which you consider Father Hennepin. But I can never believe the fabulous tales and fictions which abound in his narrative dedicated to Colbert. We may judge of the confidence it deserves from the following tales:

1. His descent from the mouth of the Illinois river to the mouth of the Mississippi (a distance of more than 1,350 American miles) in seventeen days, passing the nights on shore, and delaying a considerable time among the Indians, and in search of provisions.

2. He and two others, in a canoe, stemming the current of the Mississippi from the mouth of that river to the Illinois in twenty days. It is unnecessary to cite the other absurdities and fables scattered throughout his narrative, and I shall content myself with reminding you that, on the testimony of the Swedish naturalist Kalm, the opinion entertained of Hennepin, in Canada, is expressed in the following words: "The name of honor they give him there is the great liar; he writes of what he saw in places where he never was."

In fine, I think it easy to prove that all which of right belongs to the United States is Louisiana such as it was ceded and delivered to Spain by the Government of France, with the addition of those points and districts with which Spain retroceded it to France, and of such as, by public treaties, were annexed to it in favor of the United States. I go farther: although France might have an unquestionable right to other points and districts eastward and westward of that province, (which is not admitted,) she lost it from the moment she ceded and delivered to England all she possessed in Florida, and to the left of the Mississippi, with the exception of the city and island of New Orleans. By this cession and delivery, all the rights whatsoever which France could have beyond the delta of Louisiana were transferred to the Crown of England; and as Spain only retroceded to France what she had received from her, to nothing more could France have a right in virtue of the treaty of 1800. Whatever abstract reasoning or subtle arguments may be resorted to, it will be impossible to prove anything else, because it is impossible now to alter or amend the treaty, or to claim that which is not stipulated in it. I, therefore, have said, and I now repeat, that, to terminate this controversy, nothing is more just and natural than to recur to the period when France completed the cession and delivery of Louisiana to Spain, to establish what France then ceded to Spain, and what she retroceded and delivered in virtue of the treaty of St. Ildefonso. These preliminary points being determined, and the bases laid down which are their natural consequences, the subsequent arrangements will be attended with no difficulty.

The Government of Spain is prepared to produce all the titles and documents which I have cited, and many others I did not hitherto cite, judging it unnecessary. It is the anxious wish of the Spanish Government that a suitable opportunity may be afforded to it for the production of those titles and documents, that they may be compared and confronted with those which may be produced on the part of the United States, (for hitherto they have been merely referred to,) as neither the state of the discussion, nor what has been advanced by the United States, has permitted or required anything further.

I cannot pass over, without remark, your observations tending to prove a contradiction between Don Pedro Cevallos and what I have laid down. You state therein that I have said that the boundaries of Louisiana were most notorious and acknowledged by France; and that I finally conclude by admitting that those same boundaries have never been fixed or agreed on. That which has been said by Don Pedro Cevallos and by me, and which can admit of no doubt, is, that the western boundaries of Louisiana have always been notorious and acknowledged between Spain and France; from the ocean by a line drawn between the rivers Mermento and Calcasia, running by Arroyo Hondo, between the Adaes and Natchitoches, crossing the Rio Roxo, (Red River,) and ascending towards the north. It is the boundaries between French Louisiana and the Spanish possessions after that line has crossed Rio Roxo, (Red River,) which have never been fixed, and it is proper not to confound one thing with another.

At the same time it is proper to remark that this same divisional line between the possessions of Spain and France has not been fixed by any treaty between the two Powers, but has always been considered as such from the time that the French established themselves on the right bank of the Mississippi until they ceded and delivered that province (that is to say, the delta of Louisiana) to Spain; the said divisional line from the ocean to the point I have shown having at all times been notorious and acknowledged, both by the authorities and inhabitants of each of the territories, respectively. I can, therefore, discover nothing contradictory in what was advanced by Don Pedro Cevallos and myself in the note referred to by you, and only see in our assertions a truth of facts which it is impossible to deny. Indeed, I do not comprehend what solid reason there could be to combat this truth; and the only matter susceptible of discussion is that which refers to the points that it may be just to examine, fix, and establish for the continuation of the line northward after it has crossed the Rio Roxo (Red River.) All this may be easily adjusted if, as I have before said, the basis be admitted which I have proposed, and that is, to recur to the state of possession of France when she completed the cession and delivery of Louisiana to Spain. I remark, however, that what you have communicated is opposed to this, namely, that the United States will no longer entertain a discussion relating to the territories included in the State of Louisiana. If this were the only difficulty, I do not doubt, knowing as I do the desire of the King to do whatever might be acceptable to the United States as far it may be practicable, and comport with the dignity of his august station, that His Majesty will agree thereto; and although he will not assume the lofty and dictatorial tone which you attribute to the Spanish Government at the time of Charles V. and Philip II., if he had on this occasion adopted the same principle on which the resolution of your Government, according to your communication, has been formed, yet His Catholic Majesty is ready to hear all that can be advanced by the United States in support of their pretensions, and to relinquish any point or territory whatsoever which may lawfully belong to them, although it be comprehended and incorporated in the ancient dominions of his royal Crown.

I forbear to analyze the three principles laid down by you as being founded on the immutable basis of justice, and on the general practice of European nations which have formed settlements and acquired possessions in this hemisphere. It is sufficient to read them to be satisfied that they are wholly inapplicable to the case to which you refer; and that they are, besides, conceived with too vast a latitude to be exempt from absurdities and contradictions, not only of the general practice of nations, but of the most venerable rules of justice, and even of common sense. Fortunately, the question at issue is not in that state to render it necessary or possible for your Government to recur to those principles, because I flatter myself that the principal points on which the dispute turns are already sufficiently clear to admit of their being brought to an amicable conclusion and equitable arrangement.

Let us now pass to the subject of claims. It gives me great satisfaction to observe that we agree as to what regards claims for losses and injuries reciprocally caused by Spaniards and Americans, contrary to the law of nations and existing treaties. The convention of 1802, between the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at the Court of Spain, and His Catholic Majesty's Secretary of State, was specially formed for the settlement of these reciprocal indemnities; and, consequently, it not only from that moment established the certainty of losses and injuries caused by Americans to Spaniards, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaties, but also exhibited and admitted the right of the said Spaniards to claim adequate indemnity. This point, therefore, will be attended with no difficulty in settling it on the basis of the above-mentioned convention, with the additions as proposed to you in my note of the 24th of January, and which you state there is no difficulty in admitting. But I have at the same time to regret that we have not been able to agree on the point relating to the spoliations committed by French cruisers on the coast of Spain, and by French Consuls in Spanish ports. As it is notorious and unquestionable that these spoliations were committed by the French under the authority of their Government, I can discover no reason why Spain should be made responsible for them when the nation exists by whom they were committed.

Even the American citizens have admitted that their right was against France directly, and addressed themselves to her, by laying their claims before the competent tribunals of that nation. The United States also claimed of the French Government on the same subject. In fact, Frenchmen were the aggressors. By the French Government they were authorized. It was in French tribunals that the privateers committing the excesses complained of gave the usual bonds; they were French subjects, subject only to the laws of France, and amenable only to the Government and authorities of France. It was France alone which reaped the benefit of the produce of their captures; all which, combined with the argument I have touched on in my note in relation to this matter, cannot fail to convince you, if they be impartially attended to, that it is France, and not Spain, which should be responsible to the United States for the spoiliations in question; or, what amounts to the same thing, while France exists, there can be no right whatever to have recourse on Spain, and claim of her indemnity and compensation for those spoiliations. If the responsibility for this indemnity and compensation has not been redeemed by France, in her conventions with the United States, as you assure me, my opinion continues unchanged, that the right of the United States, or that of their citizens, can only in justice be applied to France; and I am at present no farther authorized in this case than to offer the co-operation of Spain in promoting the favorable issue of the claims of the United States on the Government of France.

Before I conclude this note, I think it fit to impress on your mind that, the United States being at peace with France at the period the occurrences now spoken of took place, there could be no difficulty in the American citizens having recourse on the Government and tribunals of France; and they, in fact, had such recourse in all those cases in which they consider themselves well founded in resorting to it; and that, notwithstanding Spain was likewise at peace with the United States, she could not ascertain whether the American vessels brought into her ports by the privateers of France, her ally, had violated the law of nations, and thereby forfeited their right to the protection due to them by Spain, in conformity to the existing treaty and the public law of nations. It was for her to believe that this point would be ascertained by the Consuls of France, and finally determined by the tribunals of cassation there. She was further to believe so by the consideration that their citizens enjoyed the benefit of a recourse to her tribunals, of which they availed themselves as often as was requisite. To this simple idea are the observations reduced, which I laid before you in my note of the 8th of January, and which you appear to consider as in contradiction with others stated in the same note—a contradiction which I do not conceive can be discovered in them.

It is my duty to repeat, from a thorough consideration, that His Catholic Majesty is earnestly desirous to satisfy the United States, and amicably to settle and adjust all pending differences, and that it is no less certain that His Majesty extends his sincere wishes, in that respect, even so far as to be willing to make every sacrifice in favor of the United States, consistent with the indisputable rights of the monarchy, and the dignity of his august character. I have already offered you these assurances; I now renew them in the most positive manner. But I cannot, however, refrain from expressing to you my great regret on perceiving that the Government of the United States seem resolved not to agree to submit the pending differences to the judgment and impartial decision of friendly Powers, or admit the mediation of any of them, as appears by your communication to me. My regret is greatly increased, when I reflect and see that the two modes pointed out are the most simple, proper, and just, which could be resorted to to terminate a dispute in which each of the parties proceeds with good faith, and conceives it is in the right. It was one which was admitted by the United States themselves, when, in the late war, they accepted the mediation of Russia, for the purpose of settling and adjusting, under the auspices of that mediation, the points on which they had not been able to agree. Nor can I more easily comprehend why there should be any obstacle to admitting one of those two modes because the United States have no communications made to them, by the Governments of Europe, of the order and state of their negotiations, and their system of policy has no interest or relation with that pursued by those Powers; it being considered expedient, as you assure me, to avoid entering into the labyrinth of European politics. As the points in dispute between your Government and that of Spain are not entangled in this labyrinth, and as the Government of the United States is confident, as you state, that their rights are clear, and their arguments invincible, I cannot conceive what inconvenience can result from referring these rights and these arguments to an impartial third party, in whom the United States have the greatest confidence, and submitting the case to its judgment and decision; or from conferring on the points embraced by the present case, and settling and adjusting them under the mediation of such Power or Powers as, in the face of the world, are most entitled to the confidence of your Government. I was told by Mr. Monroe, in one of his early notes, that if this case were submitted to the judgment of an impartial tribunal, disposed to take it into due consideration, he was confident the decision would be in favor of the United States. I know not, for my part, what would be the result; but what I can assure you is, that, whatever might be the decision of the tribunal to which the two Governments had agreed to refer their differences, it would meet the approbation of His Catholic Majesty, and relieve him from the anxiety created by this business.

Why not, then, make choice of a tribunal, and submit to its decision? Is it possible there cannot be found in the whole universe a Government, or a number of individuals, worthy of confidence in such a case? I am satisfied that your Government neither does nor can think so; and that its love of peace and amity with all Powers, its firm adherence to the principles of equity and justice, and its humane sentiments, offer the best grounded hopes that the present difficulties will be overcome, and the wished for moment is at hand when all the differences pending will be finally settled to the entire satisfaction of both Governments.

Seeing, therefore, by your communications to me, that the opinions still maintained by the Government of the United States are derogatory to the indisputable rights of the Crown of Spain, and that you propose no basis capable of reconciling the contradictory views respectively taken by each Government of the subject, I find myself unprovided with suitable powers and instructions finally to agree on and stipulate in the present case. I am, therefore, under the necessity of despatching a courier to Madrid to inform my Sovereign of the actual state of this negotiation, and to request of him the necessary orders and instructions, by increasing my powers, as may be deemed requisite, in reference to existing circumstances.

In the meantime, I confidently hope that the Government of the United States will rely on the honor and good faith of the Spanish Government, and in the earnest desire of His Catholic Majesty to satisfy the United States, and strengthen the ties of the most perfect harmony and good understanding.

As the partial gazettes throughout the Union unfortunately endeavor to scatter the seeds of animosity in the minds of unguarded persons, or such as are uninformed on the points embraced by the differences pending; and as the Congress has requested information of the President on the present state of those differences, who has laid before the House of Representatives the official correspondence on these subjects, both here and at Madrid, it would be desirable that his Excellency would be pleased also to lay the present note before Congress, as it forms a part, and is the complement of that correspondence, and presents the most unquestionable view of the amicable dispositions of Spain, and of the determination of His Catholic Majesty to omit nothing to meet the just wishes and hopes of the United States. I therefore hope that the President will be pleased to direct this measure, and that you will contribute to its adoption.

In the meantime, it is my most ardent wish that you may suggest a just mode by which we may be enabled to approach the necessary basis for the settlement of all the differences pending, by removing the principal difficulties which have hitherto obstructed our progress, as I shall, notwithstanding the deficiency of my powers and instructions, with the greatest pleasure, take into due consideration, without waiting for new orders from my Sovereign. You must be aware, sir, that those I am already furnished with cannot extend to the case presented by the proposals contained in your note of the 16th January, since Spain never imagined that the Rio Colorado, hitherto spoken of by the Minister of this Republic, could be any other than that of Natchitoches; and I did not even think you meant to speak of any other in your note, until I was more exactly informed by you; the river which you wished to designate being known by the name of San Marcos, or de las Canas. This circumstance, taken in connexion with the other respecting the cession of the Floridas without any equivalent or retribution whatever, produces an infinite difference in the view to be taken of the first proposals made on the part of your Government to that of His Catholic Majesty; and I am unable to stipulate such sacrifices, on points of such magnitude, until I have previously consulted my Court, and received orders and instructions adapted to the purpose. Hence I find myself under the necessity of despatching a messenger to Madrid with all possible expedition. But to prevent the loss of time, in the meanwhile, this need not prevent our continuing the negotiation, and employing every proper means to bring it to a conclusion, on principles of common justice and reciprocal convenience, to the satisfaction of both Governments. To attain this, I conceive it will not be difficult, provided we confine ourselves to the essential objects of the dispute, and honorably reject whatever has no important connexion with it, or cannot contribute to the end in view.

I flatter myself, sir, that both you and your Government will proceed under the influence of similar sentiments. Reposing in this hope, I renew to you the assurances of my distinguished esteem and respect. God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1818.

SIR: In the President's Message transmitted to Congress on the 25th instant, on the state of the present war with the Seminole Indians, it is declared by his excellency that the greater number of those Indians inhabit within the limits of Florida, and that Spain was consequently bound to restrain them, and prevent their committing hostilities against the United States; but that it is painful to observe that she has failed to fulfil this obligation; that it is yet unknown whether the Spanish Government has attempted to fulfil it agreeably to the stipulation of its treaty with this Republic; that His Catholic Majesty not having kept up a sufficient force in Florida to restrain those Indians, the United States had a fair right to enter the territory of that Spanish province with an armed force in order to chastise them, which will be effected, showing due respect to the Spanish authorities where they may exist, and evacuating the province as soon as the object of the war and the entry into the Spanish territory shall be obtained.

It is my duty to state to you, for the information of the President, that the Governor of Florida uniformly observed the most scrupulous neutrality throughout all that province during the late war between the United States and Great Britain and constantly employed every becoming and practicable means to avoid all manner of hostilities on the part of the Indians, alluded to by the President in his Message, against the people or citizens of the United States; in proof of which, I have the honor to enclose a letter received by me from the Governor of St. Augustine, with a correspondence also received from him in relation to this particular subject. I am yet un-informed that any complaint of the authorities or citizens of the United States had been made to that officer of the Seminole Indians, or that any demand had been made of him to restrain and compel them to make satisfaction to the United States for any injuries they may have committed. From the Governor's correspondence, a literal copy of which is enclosed, it is evident that he used the utmost attention in recommending them to observe peace and the most perfect harmony with the citizens of this Republic, in appeasing all their bickerings and jealousies, and in dissuading them from every hostile feeling towards the persons or property of the citizens of the United States. He would also at once have employed forcible means to effect this, in case any complaint had been made to him of those Indians, stating the excesses they may have committed, and the grounds there existed of obliging them to make reparation for the injuries sustained, and of punishing them for their outrages. As nothing of this kind took place, I cannot perceive how a failure in this case can be attributed to the Government of Spain.

As to what relates to His Catholic Majesty's not keeping up a more considerable force in Florida, you must be aware, sir, that Spain has reposed full confidence in the peace and good understanding subsisting with the United States, and that, relying thereon, her attention has been confined to keeping up such garrisons as were absolutely necessary to preserve good order and public tranquillity; of course, she never entertained the idea of putting that province on a war establishment. Its garrisons, being in the neighborhood of a friendly and respectable Power, were competent to the purposes they were intended for, and to keeping the Indians dependent on them within their duty, and to enforcing that peace and orderly conduct they were bound to observe, as well towards the territories and subjects of His Catholic Majesty as towards those of the United States.

It is therefore to be presumed that the information or advices communicated to the President are without foundation; and I therefore hope that his excellency, on correcting the truth of facts by an examination of the correspondence, (copy of which is herewith transmitted,) as well as by other suitable means, will be pleased to prevent any violation of the territory of Florida, or any other part of the dominions of Spain, by the troops of the United States. If that fact should unfortunately be realized, it would be my duty to enter my solemn protest against it, in the name of the King, my master; but confidently relying on the rectitude and wisdom of your Government, I trust that its measures will conform to the strict principles of justice and that good faith in which His Catholic Majesty places full confidence. Spain has at all times strictly fulfilled her engagements stipulated by the treaty with the United States, and, while she prides herself on a religious observance of them, in every particular relating to the Indians inhabiting within the territories of the monarchy, she is also desirous of protecting those unfortunates, and of acquitting herself towards them of every duty dictated by humanity. She has never permitted them to be molested by the Spanish authorities, nor a single step to be taken tending to their extermination, the dispossessing them of their properties, or disturbing them in the free enjoyment of their customs and government. The philanthropic sentiments of the American Government and people are assuredly in unison with those of His Catholic Majesty on this point. I therefore hope that those Indians, on being punished for the violences or injuries they may have committed, will be viewed with that indulgence by the President which their ignorance and rusticity seem to claim for them.

I renew the assurances of my perfect respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Jose Coppinger, Governor of St. Augustine, to Don Luis De Onis.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLORIDA,
February 10, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have most attentively examined the contents of your letter of the 17th of December last, in relation to the complaints of the Government of the United States against that of the province under my command, founded on the protection alleged to have been afforded to the English in their late war with that nation; also, on the hostilities committed by the Indians under the protection of our Government, and affirmed to be fomented by the Spaniards.

The occasion furnishes a theme for ample and well-founded discussion, were I to undertake to point out to you the motives of these complaints, and if I could contrast the conduct of the Government of this province, as to what regards the United States, with theirs in respect to the Spanish nation, on those different occasions on which they have hitherto and still do give proofs of their proceedings upon the subject of neutrality; but leaving this to your enlightened and judicious investigation, I now proceed to submit to you such information and documents as are in my reach, in compliance with your request.

In order to answer you categorically, I have had recourse to the archives of the Secretary's office for this Government, and have collected such documents as are essential, copies of which are herewith transmitted, marked No. 1 to 14. They will readily solve the two problems brought into discussion, and show that the system of this Government has been diametrically opposite to the proceedings attributed to it, which are wholly without solid or even plausible foundation.

In fact, what more convincing proof can be offered of the observance of the strictest neutrality than the total ignorance of any complaint ever being made here by the Government of the United States, their officers and citizens, of any infractions? The letters of Brigadier Don Sebastian Kindelan, then governor of this province, to the different officers under his command, recommending the observance of the strictest neutrality towards the belligerents, offer similar proofs of this spirit. The letter of John Brown, a citizen of the United States, written at that period, the claim made of the commander of the English squadron, and the copy of a letter addressed to George Woodbine, captain of infantry, and British agent with the Indian nations, at the time he came here, forming part of the documents now transmitted, are additional evidence of the protection afforded to American citizens, in conformity to the laws of nations and the sixth article of the treaty of amity, limits, and commerce, concluded between the King of Spain and the American nation on the 27th of October, 1795.
